HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 25, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] to close general debate.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, "to provide for the common defense" has always been the tie which has bound individuals, families, and communities together in the earliest beginnings of every nation. When a nation becomes great and prosperous it should be a matter of no less concern to provide for its defense in a manner that shall be commensurate with its growth and position.

Our foes must either be domestic or foreign. To overcome the former we have a small standing Army and the National Guard of the several States; but we rely for our main defense upon the patriotism of our people.

To defend ourselves from foreign foes we must depend primarily upon the strength of our fortifications and the prowess of our Navy. The maintenance of our Navy is, therefore, a matter of national concern.

I represent a district in the middle West, about midway between the Alleghany Mountains on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west, over which no cannon shot from any man-of-war upon the seaboards has found its way, yet the people of my district are fully as much interested in building up the American Navy as their more exposed brethren along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. What is true of the Seventh Congressional district of Illinois is undoubtedly true of all the districts of this country. Indeed, it was but a few days ago that the Representatives upon this floor, irrespective of party or locality, voicing the unanimous sentiment of the people, voted $50,000,000 for the national defense, which is now being used for the buying of ships and the putting of this country in a position where if war becomes necessary it will be able to successfully maintain its honor. [Applause.]

Never in our history has the American Navy been nearer to the hearts of the people than at this hour. In silence and in sorrow the American people for many days have been looking toward Havana, where sleep their "unreturning brave;" but to-day, in silence, more portentous, their eyes are fixed upon the American Navy, the defender of the living and the guardian of the honor of the dead.

If an emergency be upon us, the American Navy is ready to meet it. In every great crisis in the history of this country the American sailor has never failed to gloriously perform his duty. I desire to recall for a brief moment the splendid past of the American Navy, and then sketch the growth and development of our new Navy of to-day, and lastly to state some of the reasons why I believe we should continue the policy of strengthening our Navy in the future.

I am not here to snatch one laurel from the wreath which adorns the brow of the American soldier, but only seek to pay a tribute of deserved respect to the American sailor. The sailor on the sea has always supplemented the efforts of the soldier on the land, and the great results which have been achieved have been due to the combined strength of both.

The brilliant achievements of the American sailor in the war of our national independence, when our Navy at first consisted of only a small fleet of eight vessels, in command of Commodore Essex Hopkins, early inspired a feeling of pride in our Navy. The names of Biddle and Barry and Nichols and Whipple and of others I might mention recall the daring and bravery of that period.

What schoolboy has not read with admiration the story of John Paul Jones, as with the Ranger he ransacked the coasts of England and Scotland, or pictured him upon the deck of the Bon Homme Richard, when, amid the storm and smoke of battle, the English captain of the Serapis inquired: "The Richard, ahoy! Have you struck your colors?" And the doughty Jones replied: "No; I have not yet begun to fight." That battle established the prowess of the American Navy upon the sea.

Who, sir, has not read with satisfaction of our naval achievements in the war with the Barbary powers,

> How Truxtun fought, how Somers fell,
> How gallant Preble's daring host
> Triumphed along the Moorish coast,
> Forced the proud infidel to treat,
> And brought the Crescent to their feet.

The next great conflict was the war of 1812, which gave us the freedom of the seas. Search history through, and where will you find as gallant a band of sea captains as those who walked the decks of the American ships during that struggle?

There were Decatur and Bainbridge and Lawrence, whose dying words, "Don't give up the ship," emblazoned on a canvas, became the oriflamme of victory to Perry and his fleet upon Lake Erie. There was Porter, who so gallantly defended the Essex in the fight with the Phœbe and the Cherub, where our Farragut, then a boy, is said to have first engaged in naval warfare. There was Hull, by whose skillful seamanship the old Constitution, which the English contemptuously called "a bundle of pine boards under a bit of bunting," outsailed the English fleet, and later overcame the Guerrière. There was MacDonough, whose brilliant victory on Lake Champlain made him one of the commanding figures of all naval history.

Says a recent historian:

> The Republic of the United States owed a great deal to the excellent make and armament of its ships, but it owed still more to the men who were in them.

Then, again, in our war with Mexico, the Navy played an important part, for it was under the fire of its guns that our Army was landed at Vera Cruz, and through the combined efforts of both sailor and soldier that the war terminated to the glory of our country.

Now I come to speak of the Navy of 1861, which Lincoln called "Uncle Sam's webfoot." When Fort Sumter was fired upon, we had 90 vessels, of which 42 were in commission and of these 31 were scattered upon the seas. We had 7,600 seamen in the service, and about 1,400 officers.

Yet during the war our Navy grew to 671 vessels and 52,000 seamen, and 7,500 additional officers were enrolled. The American Navy contributed in no small degree to the grand results of that war. I will not say that they would have been otherwise without it. I leave that to Him who overrules the destinies of peoples and of nations, but that the war would have been ended as soon as it was in all human probability without the aid and assistance of the American sailor no candid student of history will affirm.

The blockading of the Eastern and Southern ports; Dupont's terrible circle of fire off Port Royal; the silencing of the Merrimac by the Monitor, called "the cheese box of Ericsson;" the opening of the Mississippi by Foote and Porter; the capture of New Orleans; the terrible fight in Mobile Bay, where Farragut, wrapped in the shrouds of the Hartford, directed the "grand, wild storm of battle;" the daring of Cushing, and the sinking of the Alabama by the Kearsarge tell their own story of the achievements of the American Navy in the late war.

No historian can ever write a complete history of that great contest and leave out the daring of the American sailor any more than he could write it and leave out the bravery of the American soldier. The one cooperated with the other, and both together, inspired by the same devotion to a common cause, preserved the Union of the North and the South, which time is fast cementing into a peace, a perpetual peace, in the everlasting bonds of American brotherhood.

> A union of lakes and a union of lands,
> A union that time can not sever,
> A union of hearts and a union of hands,
> And the flag of our Union forever.

After the war our Navy was put upon a peace footing, and decaying time reduced it still further, until in 1881, there were but few pieces left. The most powerful navy in the world, in the short space of sixteen years, had dropped to that low estate where it ranked only about twentieth.

The first definite step toward the building up of the new Navy was taken on June 29, 1881, by William H. Hunt, Secretary of the Navy, who at that time appointed a board of naval officers, with Rear-Admiral John Rodgers at its head, to report upon the Navy, and "to determine the requirements of a new navy." On November 7, 1881, this board reported and recommended the building during the eight years following of enough vessels to make our Navy consist of 21 ironclads, 70 unarmored cruisers, 20 torpedo gunboats, and 5 rams. In his report of that year Secretary Hunt called the attention of Congress to the condition of our Navy in these words:

The condition of the Navy imperatively demands the prompt and earnest attention of Congress. Unless some action be had in its behalf it must dwindle into insignificance. From such a state it would be difficult to revive it into efficiency without dangerous delay and enormous expense. These things ought not to be. While the Navy should not be large, it should at all times form a nucleus for an emergency. Its power for prompt and extended expansion should be established. It should be sufficiently powerful to assure a navigator that in whatever sea he shall sail his ship he is protected by the Star and Stripes of his country.

But no actual work began upon the building up of the new Navy until William E. Chandler became Secretary of the Navy. In his report of November 29, 1882, he likewise called the attention of Congress and the country to the deplorable condition of our ships. He reported that the available armored vessels were only 13 single-turreted monitors, and the available cruising war vessels of the Navy were but 37. He recommended that we repair those old ships only where the estimated cost of repairs would not exceed 20 per cent of the estimated cost of a new ship of the same size and of like material, and this provision was made by Congress.

The next step in the building up of the new Navy was the authorization in the naval appropriation act of March 3, 1883, of the building of the new cruisers the Atlanta, the Boston, the Chicago, and the dispatch boat Dolphin, sometimes called the A, B, C, and D of the new Navy.

Later, under act of March 3, 1885, Congress authorized the construction of the Newark, the Charleston, the Yorktown, and the Petrel. Thus under the Administration of President Arthur began the building up of the new Navy with the authorization of eight war vessels.

Secretary Whitney succeeded Secretary Chandler, and in his first report of November 13, 1885, he called especial attention to the needs of the Navy and recommended more ships, and on August 3, 1886, Congress authorized the construction of two ironclads of about 6,000 tons each, the unfortunate Maine and the Texas.

At first the Department seemed to favor English plans and purchased some for one of our ships. That Administration had yet to learn that you can no more build American ships upon English plans and make them a success than you can sail the greater ship of state upon English theories and English notions.

It was during the consideration of the naval appropriation bill that the present distinguished chairman of the Naval Committee, on July 24, 1886, offered an amendment in Committee of the Whole, providing that only materials of American manufacture should be used in the construction of our ships. That amendment, though passed in the Committee of the Whole, was defeated in the House, but, nevertheless, his contention ultimately succeeded, for the subsequent action of the Senate resulted in authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to invite proposals for the domestic manufacture of armor and gun metal, and ever since then, in every act for new ships of war, the clause has been invariably inserted that "in all their parts said vessels shall be of domestic manufacture."

Instead of buying our armor and steel abroad we now started in upon the policy of making our own country independent of all countries of the world in the matter of the construction of our ships. To use the words of Secretary Whitney, this was accomplished in two ways:

The first step was the discontinuance of all purchases of armor and gun steel abroad, and the second step was to permit the wants of the Department for armor and gun steel to accumulate until contracts could be made of such magnitude as to induce competition of domestic manufacturers, upon the condition of their erection of a plant in this country adequate to the manufacture of both iron and gun steel up to the standard of European requirements.

By this time the armor and armament of the Navy already authorized by Congress involved the expenditure of nearly $9,000,000. The Navy Department accordingly advertised for bids for all its requirements of armor and gun steel for ships of war, stipulating that it should be of domestic manufacture and allowing two and one-half years for the building of a plant.

The result of this was a contract, made with the Bethlehem Iron Company, by which a plant was built at Bethlehem, Pa., for the manufacture of the armor and gun steel required. Later, in 1890, the Carnegie Company also secured a contract from the Department for armor. Under this wise policy of Congress we have to-day plants of sufficient number and size not only to build our ships, but also to furnish the armor and steel necessary for their complete armament.

To quote the words of Secretary Tracy, of the Harrison Administration, who succeeded Secretary Whitney, in his report of November 30, 1889:

We have proved that at a time when war-ship construction seemed almost a lost art in this country American mechanics could create it anew and place the United States where it was seventy years ago, when the vessels of this Navy were the best of their class afloat. We have fostered and developed a branch of industry in America which may, if kept up, attract to itself no inconsiderable share of the profits that now go to shipbuilders abroad.

Secretary Tracy further recommended the increase of the Navy, and was of the opinion that our future Navy should consist of 20 battle ships, 20 coast-defense ships, and 60 cruisers, or 100 vessels in all. In his report he said:

The necessities of our vulnerable position therefore demand the immediate creation of two fleets of battle ships, of which 8 should be assigned to the Pacific and 12 to the Atlantic and Gulf.

It was during his administration that Congress, under act of June 30, 1890, authorized the construction of the 3 large coast line battle ships, the Indiana, the Massachusetts, and the Oregon, and, on July 19, 1892, the 1 seagoing battle ship, the Iowa.

During the last Administration, Mr. Herbert, who had previously been chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, became Secretary of the Navy. He was well informed as to all matters pertaining to it, and did much toward increasing its efficiency. On March 2, 1895, two battle ships were authorized, the Kearsarge and the Kentucky, and on June 10, 1896, three others, the Alabama, Illinois, and Wisconsin.

Since this Government began to build up the new Navy each Secretary has differentiated somewhat from his predecessors in his policy, so that our Navy to-day, although not as large as some of the navies of other countries, yet presents some points of special superiority and at the same time a general completeness in itself.

Secretary Chandler, as we have seen, prescribed the policy of repairing the old ships that were worthy of repair and recommended the building of cruisers. Then came Secretary Whitney, who offered inducements for the construction of plants for the manufacture of our armor and steel, and also recommended the building of the first two ironclads. After him came Secretary Tracy, who urged the building of still larger ships, and it was under his administration that our first-class battle ships were built.

After him followed Secretary Herbert, who believed in the efficiency of torpedo boats. All of them have been great Secretaries and have pursued wise policies in the building up of our Navy. And now our present Secretary, Mr. Long, whose administration will equal if not rival those of his predecessors, urges especially upon Congress the building of more ships and the construction of dry docks along our Eastern, Southern, and Western coasts.

Since 1883 Congress has authorized the construction of 9 first-class battle ships, 2 second-class battle ships, 2 armored cruisers, 1 armored ram, 6 double-turreted monitors, 13 protected cruisers, 3 unprotected cruisers, 10 gunboats, 6 composite gunboats, 3 of a special class, and 22 torpedo boats.

We have expended nearly $375,000,000 for the naval establishment since 1882. Of this, eighty-one millions has been expended for the construction of new vessels, nearly two millions for the equipment of new vessels, and forty and one-half millions for armor and armament of new vessels, making in all a total of nearly $124,000,000 for the construction, equipment, and armament of new vessels.

To-day our Navy compares favorably with the navies of the world. According to the table furnished by the Office of Naval Intelligence, our Navy ranks sixth. England is first, France second, Russia third, Italy fourth, Germany fifth.

Maclay, in his interesting history of the Navy, says:

In point of numbers our ships are inferior to those of several naval powers, but taking ship for ship in their several classes, those of the United States will be found to stand at the head of the list, and in case of war they may be expected to give as good an account of themselves as our cruisers did in the last war with Great Britain.

Some few years ago Mr. J. H. Byles, the designer of the steamships City of Paris and City of New York, one of the most prominent naval architects in the world, after visiting our shipyards and inspecting our designs, paid this high encomium on the construction of our ships at the meeting of the Institute of Naval Architects in London:

The American designers and builders have shown that they are equal to producing vessels quite equal to their promises, and at least equal to the best European practice.

Speaking of the armored cruiser New York, he said:

Compared with the Edgar class, this vessel is much more powerfully armored and much better protected; her sustaining sea speed will probably be greater.

Referring to our coast-line battle ships, he said:

They are distinctly superior, in most respects, to any European vessels of the same displacement, and for the purposes intended, protecting the American coast line, they seem to be a match for any ships afloat.

And we have further English authority upon the superiority of our ships. Wilson, in his celebrated work entitled Iron Clads in Action, compares our seagoing battle ship Iowa, which has a tonnage of 11,500 tons, with the English ship Majestic, which has a tonnage of 15,000 tons, 3,500 tons more than the Iowa, and concedes that there is not much to choose between them.

Thus we have demonstrated that in fifteen years our country can build a navy on American plans, and of American manufacture—in short, under a policy distinctly American—that to-day inspires the just pride of every American citizen.

A distinguished American once said:

The cannon and the ball that defend your land should be "native here." * * * The steel that edges the sword and points the bayonet of your defense should be of national metal.

And so, likewise, our American battle ship, the guardian of our national honor upon the sea, not only floats an American flag, but represents, from the top of her masthead to the keel beneath the wave, the strength of American material, the genius of American engineering, and the superiority of American workmanship.

So much for our ships. What of our men? The active personnel of our Navy to-day consists of 1,494 officers and 11,000 petty officers and enlisted men, 2,650 marines, and 750 apprentices. In addition to these we have the Naval Militia of the several States, which in time of war would be of very material assistance to the Navy. They number in all, officers and enlisted men, nearly 5,000, and I may say Illinois leads the list. [Applause.]

The men in the Navy stand high in public estimation. They are of superior character, and have a keen sense of duty and a patriotic devotion to their country. The older men have demonstrated their ability to fight "in our late unpleasantness;" and while the younger men have had little opportunity to display the stuff of which they are made, yet it can be said that they have always shown a willingness to meet emergencies as they have arisen. [Applause.]

If war should come and we were obliged to rely upon our Navy to protect the honor of this country upon the sea, the American people would soon discover that the men in the Navy to-day are fully as brave, daring, and eager to meet the foe as the American sailors of the past, "whose faith and truth on war's red touchstone rang true metal."

The 264 seamen of the Maine who went down to their watery graves in the harbor of Havana, the marine orderly, Bill Anthony, who, amid the terrible confusion and consternation, which followed the explosion, calmly reported to his captain, "Sir, I have to inform you that the ship has blown up and is sinking," the coolness and nerve displayed by Captain Sigsbee, the last one to leave the ship in that awful hour, demonstrate that every man in the American Navy to-day, from the humblest seaman to those in command, is ready to maintain the honor of our country. [Applause.]

The American people do not want war. But they prefer war with honor to peace with dishonor. Sir, they stand a solid phalanx behind their President to sustain him in this trying hour.

If war should be necessary to preserve the honor of this country, the American people have such an abiding confidence in the character, the statesmanship, and the patriotism of William McKinley, Commander in Chief of both Army and Navy, as to know that he who so bravely fought to keep our flag aloft upon the land will never permit it to go down upon the sea. [Applause.]

The question is frequently asked, "Why should we increase our Navy?"

John Adams once said that "naval power is the natural defense of the United States." Our policy has always been to build up a navy for defense and not for offense. We do not need a navy as large as the navies of the other leading countries of the world by reason of the isolated position of our country from foreign countries; but nevertheless there is a necessity for a navy large enough to protect our own interests upon the American Continent.

In the first place, we need a navy to protect our seacoasts, which extend along the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific for more than 13,000 miles.

In the second place, we need a navy to protect the rights of American citizens wherever they may reside in all parts of the world.

In the third place, we need a navy to protect our commerce along our coasts and with foreign countries. During the past year our foreign commerce nearly reached the sum of $2,000,000,000. The navy is the natural ally of commerce, and with its increasing strength will come the building up of the American merchant marine, for no man will put his money into ships unless he knows that the American flag will be protected in every port and harbor of the world. It is an old saying and one worthy of all acceptation that "trade always follows the flag." This has been especially demonstrated in the case of Great Britain, which has the greatest navy of the world.

At the present time the condition of our merchant marine is deplorable. In 1825 Webster said: "We have a commerce which leaves no seas unexplored, and navies which take no law from superior force." At that time 93 per cent of the foreign carrying trade of this country was borne in American ships; in 1830, 90 per cent; in 1835, 85 per cent; in 1840, 83 per cent; in 1845, 81 per cent; in 1850, 72 per cent; in 1855, 75 per cent; in 1860, before the war, 66 per cent; in 1865, only 28 per cent, a loss of 38 per cent in those five years.

These facts testify to the truth expressed by Sir Charles Wilson, an English authority, when he stated, "If there is one point clearer than another in the history of commerce, it is this, that when a state can not effectually protect its carrying trade in time of war, that trade passes from it and does not return."

In 1870 our ships handled 35 per cent of the carrying trade; in 1875, 26 per cent; in 1880, 18 per cent; in 1885, 17½ per cent; in 1890, 13 per cent; in 1895, nearly 12 per cent, and in 1897 we reached the lowest figure, of about 11½ per cent.

The Republican party, in its national platform adopted at St. Louis in 1896, pledged itself to the building up of the American merchant marine in these words:

We favor the early American policy of discriminating duties for the upbuilding of our merchant marine and the protection of our ships in the foreign carrying trade, so that American ships, the product of American labor employed in American shipyards, sailing under the Stars and Stripes, and manned, officered, and owned by Americans, may regain the carrying of our foreign commerce.

Let us, then, rebuild the American merchant marine and restore it to its former state of national greatness, where it will again send a thrill of pride along the vertebræ of every American citizen. The American merchant marine and the American Navy; the one to bear our commerce and the other to protect it!

While our commercial policy is to build up the industries of this country and to supply the home market, which we propose to hold against all the world, yet, nevertheless, as time goes on we will seek more and more foreign markets in which to sell the surplus of our products.

Closely identified with the building up of our foreign commerce is the importance of building the Nicaragua Canal, which will not only bind the Atlantic and Pacific coasts together, but also at the same time bring the port of New York hundreds of miles nearer than Liverpool to the coasts of China and Japan, which are now opening up to the light of modern civilization and will be the great markets of the future.

Standing like sentinels, guarding the eastern and western entrances of this canal, will be the Island of Cuba, now struggling to be free, and that of Hawaii, seeking annexation to this country. The right settlement of these important questions is closely connected with the extension of our foreign commerce and the future commercial policy of this country.

This leads me to another important reason why we should favor the continued enlargement of our Navy. The maintenance of our foreign policy depends primarily and fundamentally upon the strength of our arm upon the sea. Our foreign policy has been one of growth. A hundred years ago Washington, in his remarkable Farewell Address, laid down this principle:

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is to have with them as little political connection as possible.

And further he stated:

It is our true foreign policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world—and cautioned us to beware of European entanglements. This was the initial foreign policy of this country and one which we have maintained ever since. Our Republic at that time was an infant in swaddling clothes, and perhaps it was not wise to then announce the important corollary which unmistakably followed.

It remained for James Monroe, twenty-seven years afterwards, when our Republic had reached the full standard of its majority and had met and whipped the greatest naval power of the world, to restate in substance what Washington had declared and the plain inference to be drawn from it, that—

Our policy in regard to Europe which was adopted at an earlier stage of the wars which so long have agitated that quarter of the globe nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers. * * * But in regard to these continents circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. * * * We should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

Under the inspiration of that sentiment, the so-called Monroe doctrine, which is the cardinal principle of our foreign policy, the Spanish-American colonies then struggling for liberty, were nerved to greater activity and most of them achieved their independence. We are responsible in no small degree for the freedom of the Spanish-American countries. We blazed the pathway along which they have come. Francisco Miranda, the first leader of South American independence, at the age of 24 years, enlisted in our war of the Revolution and was upon the staff of Washington.

Indeed, it is written of Bolivar, the great South American liberator, who was frequently called the second Washington, that upon a visit to the United States he paid homage at the tomb of the Father of our Country and there, recalling the greatness of that life and its splendid devotion to the cause of liberty, dedicated his own to Venezuelan independence.

Sir, the seed that was sown amid toil and sacrifice more than two hundred and seventy years ago out of love for man and in fear of God on our wild New England coast was planted there to grow, and to-day, looking back over a hundred years, we can see its fruits scattered all over the American continents.

One hundred years ago there was but one republic in the Western Hemisphere; to-day we have nineteen. One hundred years ago the free territory was only 5 per cent of the total area of America; to-day it is 76 per cent, and if you count Canada, which has an autonomy of its own, about 98 per cent.

In the light of the past, there can be but one destiny for all Spanish-American countries, and that is their complete overthrow of all foreign dominion, the establishment of their independence, and their commercial and defensive union with our country, which inspired their action, nerved their arm, and joyfully awaits the entrance of them all into the great sisterhood of American republics.

That distinguished Englishman, James Bryce, mistakes the full mission of this country when, in his able article in the December number of the Forum, he says:

> The United States has already a great and splendid mission in building up between the oceans a free, happy, and prosperous nation of 200,000,000 people.

It is that and more. The mission of our country is like that of every citizen within it, twofold: First, to build up itself, and, secondly, to aid in the upbuilding of others. [Applause.]

Over and above these splendid words of Mr. Bryce I place those of that other Englishman, that great commoner, John Bright, who in 1862, in a speech at Birmingham, in replying to Gladstone that the North must lose and that the Union could not be preserved, said:

> I can not believe, for my part, that such a fate will befall that fair land, stricken though it now is with the ravages of war. I can not believe that civilization in its journey with the sun will sink into endless night in order to gratify the ambition of the leaders of this revolt. * * * I have another and a far brighter vision before my gaze.
> It may be a vision, but I will cherish it. I see one vast confederation stretching from the frozen North in unbroken line to the glowing South, from the wild billows of the Atlantic westward to the calmer waters of the Pacific main. And I see one people, and one language, and one law, and one faith, and over all that wide continent the home of freedom and a refuge for the oppressed of every race and of every clime.

Lastly, we need a navy as security for peace. In fact, the strongest security of peace is the strength of an armed resistance. Washington said:

> To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace.

[Applause.]

We have hailed with great satisfaction the efforts which have been made in the past, and which I trust will be continued, to consummate a treaty between the two great English-speaking nations on the globe by which all international disputes will be settled in the arena of international arbitration. But let us remember that a weak power has seldom, if ever, been able to secure arbitration as against a strong one. It is not likely that England would have arbitrated the Venezuelan boundary question unless our Government had stepped in and called upon her to do so. There is one thing that will always force arbitration, and that is national prowess. [Applause.]

While to-day we are desirous for lasting peace with all nations, yet let us not delude ourselves with the idea that we must necessarily discourage means of defense, for England, France, and Russia are spending more money upon their navies to-day than they have in any previous years of their existence.

On February 5 the following information was specially cabled to the New York Tribune:

MILLIONS FOR ENLARGING THE NAVY.

> The naval budget, the most important features of which have been adopted by the Chamber of Deputies, embodies a programme which is considered in naval circles the French counterpart of the British naval defense act of 1889, for it commits France for a period of five years, from 1898 to 1903, to the active prosecution of a policy requiring an average annual expenditure in the single item of building new ships amounting to $22,500,000, being 25 per cent above the highest estimate for this purpose ever voted by any French Parliament.
> The full significance of this is apparent when taken in connection with the corresponding simultaneous increase in the Russian naval budget, which devotes $13,750,000 to building new Russian ships. Consequently, France and Russia together will spend during 1898 over $36,250,000 for new ships alone, which, by a singular coincidence, tallies closely with the $36,500,000 which England decided to expend for the same purpose during the same period.

The reign of universal peace has not yet come. Universal peace will come only when universal justice has been attained. The struggle of the human race is, after all, a struggle for universal justice in its desire to achieve the perfect liberty of mankind. Liberty is a mighty stream; it reaches back through all the ages that are past and rushes on through all the ages yet to come, until its mighty current loses itself in the boundless ocean of the Creator's love. [Applause.]

So long as the oppressed of other lands are bowed down under the heel of military despotism; so long as the Turks mercilessly slay the innocent Christians in Armenia; so long as the Cretans are restless under the domination of allied power; so long as the Cubans are fighting their war of American independence—God speed their coming deliverance; so long as the cry of humanity in any part of the world for enlarged liberty finds no encouraging response, so long will universal peace be only the dream of the mind and the wish of the heart. [Applause.]

When universal liberty and universal justice shall have become one, when the golden rule shall have become the accepted principle of international law, and when the teachings of the lowly Nazarene shall have become the established conduct of nations as well as of individuals, then, and not until then, will "the war drums beat no longer and the battle flags be furled in the parliament of man, the federation of the world." [Long-continued applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. There are three minutes of time remaining to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine surrenders the balance of the time, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY OF THE NAVY.

For the pay of officers on sea duty; officers on shore and other duty; officers on waiting orders; officers on the retired list; clerks to commandants of yards and stations; clerks to paymasters at yards and stations; general storekeepers; receiving ships and other vessels; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge; interest on deposits by men; pay of 12,750 petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men in the engineers' force and for the Coast Survey Service and Fish Commission, and of 1,000 boys under training at training stations and on board training ships, and for men detailed for duty with naval militia at the pay prescribed by law, $9,125,460. And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist at any time after the passage of this act as many additional men as in his discretion he may deem necessary to man the ships in commission: Provided, That the total number of men and boys in the general service and under training shall not exceed 12,750 men and 1,000 boys.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, somewhat more than a month ago our proud ship Maine, officered and manned by as brave and as heroic a crew as ever went down to the sea in ships, with explosion and havoc was engulfed in the dark waters of Habana Harbor. It was night, and those brave men were wrapped in slumber, mayhap dreaming of future fame and glory or of home and loved ones there. The buoyancy of youth made their sleep deep and vigorous, and doubtless clothed their dreams in roseate hues. From dreamland they were summoned by the black usher of death through the deep and strange waters to the mysteries of eternity.

Their virtues
Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against
The deep damnation of their taking-off;
And pity, like a naked new-born babe,
Striding the blast, or heaven's cherubim, horsed
To the sightless couriers of the air,
Shall blow the horrid deed in every eye,
That tears shall drown the wind.

Since that fatal and fateful night our relations to Spain and Cuba have been a series of humiliations and reproaches. It would seem that some awful calamity was necessary to arouse this nation and Congress to a realization of their duty toward a murdered neighbor. Talk of the Armenian outrages or the atrocities of the "Unspeakable Turk!" Why, they pale into misdemeanors merely compared with the bloody crimes committed under Spanish misrule in Cuba. Almost one-half of the population of that fair island has been sacrificed by the murderous policy of the monster Weyler. Speak of autonomy to a people thus slaughtered! Spain, always cruel and always deceitful, that offers in the gloved hand what appears to be a rose, but, when grasped, is a stinging thorn. A nation of hypocrisy, of false glamour, of meretricious pretenses, her fair promises ending in cruel disappointment or betrayal. As the poet tenderly and sorrowfully exclaims, depicting these disappointments and broken promises and hopes:

So floating down a languid stream,
The lily leaves oft lilies seem,
Reflecting back the whitened beams
Of morning's slanting sun;
But as I near and nearer came,
I missed the lily's fragant flame.
The gay deceit was o'er;
No snow-white lily blossomed fair,
There came no perfume on the air,
Only an idle leaf lay there
And wantoned in the sun.

Mr. Chairman, no matter what the judgment of the board of inquiry may be as to the responsibility for the sinking of the battle ship Maine, whether by submarine mine or other explosion or from within, in the name of God and of humanity this great nation should declare the island free and independent, and drive the soldiery of embruited and degenerate Spain from off its fair and fertile soil. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 4037. An act to correct the military record of James Denny;
S. 4124. An act for the protection of song birds;
S. 2673. An act for the relief of William A. Cowles;
S. 3871. An act to authorize the Montgomery-Elmore Bridge and Improvement Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Alabama River near the city of Montgomery, Ala.;
S. 4206. An act extending the time for the construction of a wagon and motor bridge across the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., as provided by act approved June 3, 1896;
S. 1354. An act granting a pension to Burton Packard;
S. 1901. An act to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army;
S. 244. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Joplin, in the State of Missouri;
S. 4137. An act amending section 4492 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to barges.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, when, a few weeks ago, Congress unanimously voted to place $50,000,000 at the disposal of the President for national defense, the American people rejoiced, and the nations of the world stood dumfounded and spellbound. Such an inspiring spectacle of political unanimity, such a ready subordination of historical or party differences to the common cause of the nation, such a display of genuine patriotism, had never been witnessed either here or elsewhere, either in this age or any other. It was the God-like voice of a reunited people proclaiming American power, national unity, and the triumphant success of popular self-government. [Applause.]

In order to lessen the effect of that historical vote, to break the spell, European and particularly Spanish newspapers have seen fit, in a vain attempt to comfort their readers, to point to the variety of races and nationalities living in the United States, whose very presence, they imagine, justifies the conclusion that our boasted unanimity and harmony do not really exist, but are only perfunctory and skin-deep. One Spanish diplomat even went so far as to assert in so many words that in a war with any European power the adopted citizens of this country would be found to be a weak spot in Uncle Sam's armor. It is on this point, Mr. Chairman, that I crave the opportunity to say a few words.

I am loath to treat these aspersions seriously and would prefer to offer them up as a ridiculous contribution to the gaiety, not of nations, but of the American people, were it not for the fact that this rot is finding a sporadic echo and reecho among a class of people here who imagine themselves to possess an exclusive patent upon loyalty and patriotism and never tire in drawing invidious distinctions between native and adopted citizens of the United States. Nothing, in my judgment, can be more unseasonable than to accentuate such differences now, and I can not imagine a more propitious time than the present to advocate the cause and spirit of true fraternity.

The other day when we had the $50,000,000 bill under consideration, and when we heard so much truly patriotic talk, I sat silently in my seat thinking that my vote would, perhaps, be the most eloquent speech I could make on the subject. But ever since that time I have patiently waited for some one to rise in his seat, not himself an adopted citizen, who would feel called upon to do justice to the true sentiments of that numerous element of our population which has become part and parcel of our body politic through the process of naturalization.

Somehow I felt that these people had a right to expect such vindication, and really there is none of us too great to do them reverence. There is not a man on this floor who does not represent some of them, and who does not know that they bled upon every American battlefield from Lexington to Appomattox. Yet nothing has as yet been said on this floor to refute the implied slanders of these foreign editors and their native echoes.

We are apt to regard the theory of the brotherhood of man as a beautiful dream hardly to be realized; but in tempests on the ocean, in the face of a common danger, I have seen that fraternal spirit manifested in a way which would have gladdened the heart of the most orthodox of Christians. So, in the face of the present great emergency, I may be pardoned for saying it myself, for saying it in behalf of the adopted citizens of our country, that they are no longer English, German, Irish, Scandinavian—that they are nothing if not, one and all, heart and soul, Americans! [Applause.]

I have the honor, and have had for the last six years, of representing a district 75 per cent of whose population is German-born or of German extraction. It is a veritable Gibraltar of patriotism—so much so that I invite comparison. I challenge anyone to point out a spot in the United States, and I care not where you go, either to Puritan New England, or the Cavalier States of the South, or the pioneer country of the far and omnivorous West, where you can find more genuine loyalty, more faithful devotion to the flag, more honest love of country, than in the Tenth district of Missouri, with its preponderance of German-American voters.

It was due to the loyalty of the older men of that district that Missouri was saved to the Union, and to-day nowhere in the country would the call of the President for volunteers to defend the flag meet with a more enthusiastic response than in the heart of the territory which embraces South St. Louis and stretches all around the great metropolis of the Mississippi Valley and touches, both north and south of it, the "Father of Waters."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I should like to have about five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for an extension of his time for five minutes. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The chair hears none.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But it is not for my district alone that I desire to speak on this occasion. I know I voice the sentiments of every German-American in the country when I say, For America—America against England, America against Spain, America against Germany, America against the world, America right or wrong, always for America! [Applause.]

This is not brag and bluster, Mr. Chairman. All I have to do in corroboration of this sentiment is to refer to American history. These adopted citizens may, as a prominent German-American of this city has recently expressed it, speak their native tongue, as did the heroes of Camp Jackson, may sing the songs of the Fatherland, read the poems of their immortal poets, enjoy the paintings of their artists, may admire the philosophy of Humboldt and the statesmanship of Bismarck, but when it comes to the question on which side they will fight, if that question should ever be seriously asked, you will find them, where they ever have been found, marching under the Stars and Stripes to the inspiring tune of Yankee Doodle, doing their patriotic duty as brave and consistent American citizens toward the country of their choice. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. They will march under the tune of Dixie as well.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, because the tunes of Dixie and Yankee Doodle have recently been blended, and the combined harmony is grander. [Applause.]

They claim no superiority over others, but yield to none in patriotic devotion to the Government and the flag, and therefore have a right to resent any and all discriminations on account of their birthplace. They have come from love of liberty and a praiseworthy desire to better their condition, and have identified themselves for good with our institutions and destinies. They live and die, love and hate, and fight as Americans. The United States is their and their children's country and the Star Spangled Banner their only flag.

In the present emergency they do not wish for war, but they do not wish peace either if it can not be preserved honorably. They are calm, quiet, conservative, but also quick to respond to their country's call; ready to shed their lifeblood for what the President and Congress should proclaim to be America's cause. So let us hear no more of such distinctions and discriminations between the citizens of our country!

I thank my colleague for having yielded to me, and I thank the House for its attention. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY, MISCELLANEOUS.

For commissions and interest; transportation of funds; exchange; mileage to officers while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers while traveling abroad under orders, and for traveling expenses of apothecaries, yeomen, and civilian employees, and for actual and necessary traveling expenses of naval cadets while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as cadets; for rent and furniture of buildings and offices not in navy-yards; expenses of courts-martial, prisoners and prisons, and courts of inquiry, boards of inspection, examining boards, with clerks' and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; stationery and recording; expenses of purchasing-paymasters' offices of the various cities, including clerks, furniture, fuel, stationery, and incidental expenses; newspapers and advertising; foreign postage, telegraphing, foreign and domestic; telephones; copying; care of library, including the purchase of books, photographs, prints, manuscripts, and periodicals; ferriage, tolls, and express fees; costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress; canal tolls and pilotage; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; reports; professional investigation; cost of special instruction, at home or abroad, in maintenance of students and attachés and information from abroad, and the collection and classification thereof, and other necessary and incidental expenses, $300,000.

Mr. HARTMAN. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I now ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for twenty minutes beyond the five minutes allowed under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that he be allowed twenty minutes in addition to the five minutes allowed under the rule. Is there objection?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am obliged to insist that the rule which requires that remarks shall be directed to the bill be enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana? Does the gentleman from Maine wish to be understood as objecting?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I said I objected to any infringement of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is whether there is objection to the request for extension of the gentleman's time for twenty minutes beyond the five minutes allowed under the rule. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Does the gentleman desire to address the House upon the merits of this bill?

Mr. HARTMAN. I do not, sir.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then I must object.

Mr. HARTMAN. I move to strike out the last word; and I will ask at the end of five minutes to have my time extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana will proceed.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed by every gentleman who does me the honor of listening to my remarks that the platform which I am about to present to be adopted by the Republican party at its convention in 1900 is an exact and accurate reflection of Republican sentiment, Republican thought, and Republican purpose, as evidenced by the Republican papers and by the gentlemen who represent that party upon this floor and elsewhere. This is the platform:

In obedience to the instructions of those who dictate the policies and control the actions of the Republican party, we, their representatives and delegates in national convention assembled, renew our declared allegiance to their interests, our acquiescence in their wishes, and our eternal fidelity to their commands.

We cordially indorse the Administration of our great leader, MARCUS AURELIUS HANNA, President de facto of the Republic, which has so sacredly kept faith with the trusts and corporations by generously reimbursing them with legislative and executive favors for the enormous sums so liberally and patriotically contributed by them to the Republican party in the campaign of 1896 to "preserve the honor and integrity of the nation."

We specifically condemn the platform of the Republican national conventions of 1888 and 1892 in opposition to "all combinations of capital organized in trusts or otherwise to control arbitrarily the condition of trade among our citizens."

We heartily commend the Republican national convention which met at St. Louis in 1896 in declining to condemn or criticise trusts, and we hereby declare it to be the present and future policy of the Republican party to foster and encourage trusts, to the end that further and greater contributions may be secured with which to enable us to "purify the ballot" and "preserve the honor and integrity of the nation."

The Republican party is unreservedly for "sound money." We said so in 1896, but most of us did not know what we meant by it then. But the bondholders, creditors, and bankers, who know all about the science of money, have told us that we meant the gold standard, greenback retirement, and bank issue and control of paper money. We therefore, recognizing their intellectual and moral superiority, declare our complete and abiding confidence in their wisdom and unselfish patriotism, and cheerfully obey their orders, announce our perpetual loyalty to the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury to "commit the country more thoroughly to the gold standard," retire the greenbacks and Treasury notes, and give to the banks the exclusive right to issue or refuse to issue paper money to enable the people to transact their business; and we further solemnly declare that any man who dares question the infallibility or perfection of this financial policy is an "anarchist," a "repudiationist," and personally "dishonest" and "corrupt."

In unmeasured terms we express our utter detestation and disgust with the Republican national conventions of 1888 and 1892 for the "wild-eyed," "long-haired," "anarchistic," "Populistic," "socialistic," "communistic" language contained therein, as follows:

"The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver."—Platform 1888.

"The American people from tradition and interest favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal."—Platform 1892.

We would use harsher language in denouncing this blatant nonsense of these two Republican conventions were it not that one William McKinley, who is supposed by some ill-informed people to be President of the United States, was chairman of the platform committee of the convention of 1888 and permanent chairman of the convention of 1892, and we do not desire to seriously embarrass him. We further declare that the Republican party has not changed its platform or faith on the financial question, and anybody that says that it has is a "liar," a "footpad," and a "border ruffian."

With our faces turned toward Wall street, from whence all blessings flow, for support and sustenance, we solemnly declare that when the Republican convention at Minneapolis asserted that "the American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money," it meant to declare unequivocally for gold alone as "standard money," and any man who does not understand it that way is a "lunatic and ought to be confined in an asylum."

We indorse the lofty and patriotic sentiment expressed so eloquently by our distinguished ally, Hon. John M. Palmer, in the campaign of 1896, to the effect that he would rather live in a monarchy than in a republic where the principles of the Chicago platform prevailed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. HARTMAN. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It was my duty and the duty of other members of the House to call the gentleman to order before; but I did not desire to interfere with the gentleman's use of his five minutes.

Mr. HARTMAN. Upon what ground could the gentleman have called me to order?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That you are not addressing yourself to the measure before the House.

Mr. HARTMAN. I am not addressing myself to the measure before the House, Mr. Chairman, but I am doing what every single member of the House has been doing under the privilege accorded him by the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARTMAN. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make another motion while one is pending.

Mr. HARTMAN. Very well; I give notice that later on I will finish the reading of this platform if it takes a week.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman has a right to move an amendment to his first motion. Certainly that parliamentary right is not to be done away with. Under the rules, Mr. Chairman, an amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana made no such motion.

Mr. HARTMAN. I made a motion to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; and that motion being pending, the gentleman did not move to amend his former motion.

Mr. HARTMAN. I move to amend the pending motion by striking out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; the Chair recognizes the gentleman.

Mr. HARTMAN (continuing the reading)—

Following the instructions of those who dictate our policies, control our conventions, and manage our Administration, we bow in worshipful adoration at the feet of Grover the Fat——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana will suspend. The gentleman from Maine will state his point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. My point is that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the merits of the measure before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Montana will proceed in order.

Mr. BAILEY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, if the Chair intends to hold that in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union it is not permissible for a gentleman to address himself to the general condition of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair intends to make a distinction between general debate in Committee of the Whole and debate under the five-minute rule; and the Chair does not intend to hold——

Mr. BAILEY. But there is no such distinction either in the rules of this House or in the practice of this body.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been a distinction, according to the recollection of the Chair, in the practice of this body——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. May I read the rule for the information of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maine on the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Paragraph 5 of Rule XXIII——

Mr. HARTMAN. Does this come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is discussing the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Paragraph 5 of Rule XXIII provides that—

When general debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which the member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate thereon; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to an amendment; and neither an amendment nor an amendment to an amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof unless by the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. HARTMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has completed his statement, I desire to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has once ruled upon the point of order, but if the gentleman desires to discuss the point of order the Chair will hear him.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to this fact, because I am sure, from my knowledge of the Chairman, that he desires to be entirely fair in this matter——

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, may we have order, so that we can hear?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order.

Mr. HARTMAN. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that during all the debate which has taken place here to-day and yesterday the utmost latitude has been accorded to gentlemen. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], a most excellent gentleman, was given all the latitude and permission to discuss questions that he saw fit, under the five-minute rule, not under the general debate. Now, I ask the attention of the Chair: In support of the amendment which I have made I submit that the remarks which I am about to submit—and to which I ask the Chair to listen, so that he may know I am right—that those remarks are as applicable to my amendment as the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] were to his. Now, it is only a few lines, and I ask the attention of the Chair to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the Chair is not whether the remarks of the gentleman from Montana are as pertinent to his amendment as the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri were to his. No one raised the question of order upon the gentleman from Missouri. It is not a question of comparison. It is simply a question whether the remarks of the gentleman from Montana are pertinent to his amendment.

Mr. HARTMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, until I have submitted the remarks—and there are only nine lines here—you can not tell whether they are pertinent or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled upon the remarks that the gentleman has already made.

Mr. HARTMAN. Very well; now I will submit some additional remarks. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to submit what I have to say after the gentleman from Montana has concluded what he has to say.

Mr. HARTMAN. There are only nine lines here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and on that appeal I desire to be heard.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no table in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then there is no appeal.

Mr. BAILEY. There is an appeal from the decision of the Chair in the Committee on the Whole.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I should like to submit a motion like this, that no remarks made——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has the floor, but if the gentleman from Texas will permit the Chair to hear the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair will be obliged to him.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly; so that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to suggest to the Chairman that there is a perfect remedy for all this right within his own hands, that remarks made after the Chair has decided the gentleman out of order shall not go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There you have got the remedy against this sort of filibustering.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas appeals from the decision of the Chair, and desires to discuss the appeal.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, in response to what the gentleman from Ohio has said, in order that we may not have any infraction of the proprieties of the House or the committee, it is only necessary to remind him that the Committee of the Whole has no jurisdiction of the matter of the RECORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes, it has.

Mr. BAILEY. And neither has the Chairman nor the Speaker the absolute control over what goes into that RECORD, and anybody who undertakes, without the authority of the House itself, to determine what shall appear in that RECORD violates not only a duty——

Mr. FOOTE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to complete that sentence, but I will allow myself to be interrupted in the middle of a sentence by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FOOTE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not mean to go so far. I wished to ask how much time there was left. I did not know but that might be a solution of the whole question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is discussing an appeal from a decision of the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, there is an old maxim that hard cases make bad law. The judges sometimes, in order to avoid what appears to them to be an injustice in a particular case, establish a rule that operates harshly and unjustly in ninety-nine other cases. I apprehend that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole is about to perpetrate a similar folly. In order to deny the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] an opportunity to deliver his sentiments upon the general state of the country, the Chair is about to decide, indeed the Chair has decided, that the gentleman from Montana must confine himself to the particular amendment which he has offered.

Mr. HARTMAN. Just a moment. I want to interrupt the gentleman from Texas. I want to assure the gentleman from Texas that I am not offering my sentiments, but the sentiments of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, that is clearly not in order, even in discussing an appeal.

Mr. BAILEY. That makes very little difference as to the question of order. Mr. Chairman, the very amendment which the gentleman from Montana has submitted shows that it is well-nigh impossible to speak to that amendment and that amendment only, and yet that is the amendment submitted in ninety cases out of every hundred in this House upon which these five-minute speeches are delivered.

I appeal to the memory of the eldest in the service here, I appeal to every man on both sides if he will not bear me witness that nine times out of every ten the motion is to strike out the last word. And yet I defy the eldest in the House to say when any man ever addressed himself to that specific motion to strike out the last word. It is a formal motion, so understood in the immemorial practice of the House, that when a gentleman desires to speak for five minutes during the consideration of the bill by paragraphs he simply moves to strike out the last word, and upon that he delivers his sentiments. Even if he should discuss the paragraph under consideration, he would not be discussing his amendment, and under the decision of the Chair he would not be permitted to discuss the paragraph unless he discussed the amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is such a thing as teaching instructions that will come back to plague you. It may be that you rely upon our sense of common fairness not to invoke rules against you which you unjustly enforce against us, and you have ample ground for that opinion, because every member on this side sat here and heard the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] speak until he had concluded what he had to say, and no man made a point of order against him.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If the gentleman from Texas will permit me, if my attention had been called, or I had heard—I was for a moment diverted from listening to the debate—if I had heard the gentleman from Missouri discussing anything else than the provisions of this bill, I should have called him to order.

Mr. BAILEY. It was not for a moment, because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] occupied several moments, and he followed the gentleman from New Jersey. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] in charge of this great bill, carrying an enormous sum of money, was not heeding the debate upon the very first paragraph of it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Oh, well, if the gentleman from Texas thinks——

Mr. BAILEY. I take the gentleman's word for it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If the gentleman from Texas thinks that is up to his size of statesmanship, why, I am perfectly willing to let it go at that. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. I might be trying to reduce myself to the size of statesmanship represented on that side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sincerely in earnest in appealing to the Chair not to write into the records of this Congress a decision like that. I will venture the assertion that the Chair with his utmost research can not find a parallel for it in the records of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has an authority here.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will pause, without asking the Chair to read it himself, and will ask the Chair if he will lend it to me long enough so that I can read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the gentleman's attention to it. The ruling was made on January 30, 1897, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was in the chair, in the consideration of the Agricultural bill. The ruling was that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who was discussing the question of silver, should not proceed in that discussion. There was an appeal from the decision of the Chair——

Mr. BAILEY. Upon what ground?

Mr. HOPKINS. Upon the same point made against the gentleman from Montana.

The CHAIRMAN. The point was raised in these words:

I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the paragraph now pending.

That was the point of order raised. That point of order was sustained. There was an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BAILEY. I ought to have said, and if I had been as cautious as I usually am, I would have said you could not have found that decision before this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. That was in the last Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. The 30th of January, 1897, was a Republican Congress, with a Republican Chairman, enforcing the Republican doctrine to prevent the free speech that has been heretofore allowed upon the floor of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the whole of it. And you might just as well confess it now, for I know that any appeal to the Chair falls on deaf ears.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then your talk is dilatory. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. That is the first sensible observation I have heard from the gentleman from Maine in a long time. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I shall wait patiently to hear the first sensible observation from the gentleman from Texas. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. The truth is, the gentleman from Maine, as we all know, is easily excited, and ever since that unfortunate disaster that destroyed the battle ship that bore the name of his State, I have been apprehensive that a similar occurrence was going to happen in his case. [Great laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Spontaneous combustion.

Mr. BAILEY (continuing). And there would be no doubt of the fact that it was an explosion from the inside if it should occur. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope it would not prove so disastrous to me as it does to the gentleman from Texas. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine was right. What I have been saying was intended to consume the time of the House, and to expend enough of it to prove that it would be better for him to have allowed the gentleman from Montana to proceed than it was to strangle him in this fashion.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And, Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what this whole performance means. There is a purpose demonstrated [cry of "Ruling!"] that there are ways in which the time of this House can be wasted other than by an enforcement of the rules. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that we have a vote.

Mr. CANNON. A single word.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. On the appeal of the gentleman from Texas I just want to say a word. I am quite as jealous of the rights of members in Committee of the Whole as is the gentleman from Texas. The right of one is the right of another. The right of a member in Committee of the Whole is the right of each member of the committee.

Now, the gentleman from Montana avows his purpose, in a manly way, not to discuss the bill. There is no confusion about that. He says that he proposes to talk about other matters. Now, when a member of the Committee of the Whole is in charge of an appropriation bill he could not proceed and complete his bill without the aid of the Committee of the Whole, or with its approval, unless, with due discretion, he made points of order in questions like this. Sometimes points of order are not made, and where there is no hurry about time or where it is clearly the time of the committee and each member of it, you could go on and have your discussion; but so far as I recollect, invariably when the point of order has been invoked under the five-minute rule the ruling has always been the same way. I recollect when the sundry civil bill was under discussion I made the point of order several times, and it was sustained and acquiesced in without much friction on the part of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman ever remember in all his long service in this House a single instance where any member of the committee had moved to strike out the last word and then addressed himself to his amendment?

Mr. CANNON. That is a very proper question, and I will answer it. I will say to the gentleman that to strike out the last word is a pro forma amendment, to enable a member of the Committee of the Whole to discuss the paragraph that is, in fact, before the committee; and if any member of this committee desires to make the point of order, it is the right of the member to make the point of order if the discussion wanders away from the paragraph. Now, as to whether it is best to make it or not, that is another question. Now, then, all I desire to say is I am quite as much interested as any member of the committee in seeing the fullest discussion; but there comes a time when, if the Committee of the Whole is to perform its function, the rules must be enforced.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will stand here and say that he has seen this side of the House attempt to waste time on more than three occasions during this session? And in each instance it was where this side had been denied a fair opportunity for debate.

Mr. CANNON. I am not here to criticise that side.

Mr. BAILEY. Is not that a fact within the knowledge of the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON. I am not here to criticise either side of the House. We are all members of the Committee of the Whole. I made a point of order upon a gentleman on that side of the House in the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, and upon one on this side of the House; and, without referring to either side, it is merely a question of the orderly transaction of business, and it is therefore in the power of any member of the Committee of the Whole to invoke the rules, if he sees proper to do so, when you come to the question of right. That is all that I am seeking to discuss.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question before he sits down?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not trespass upon the time of the House at any great length, and yet it strikes me there are one or two phases of this question that ought to be called to the attention of the committee. You are seeking to adopt a new system for the government of speech in this House. The Chair has not claimed that the first precedent that can be cited is in excess of fifteen months old, out of one hundred years of American history. It will be remembered that the other day when there was an effort to again invoke that rule, a distinguished gentleman, an able parliamentarian, under circumstances similar to these, held that the gentleman did not have the right to speak. An appeal was taken from the ruling of the Chair, and the committee stood equally divided on the question, and that ruling was only sustained by the Chair voting to sustain his own ruling.

Outside of that there was an equal division, with a large majority of the House in sympathy, politically, with the occupant of the chair. We can not make fish of one and fowl of another; if we could do it, we ought not do it. It will not be denied that from the time the House met this morning and went into Committee of the Whole, a little after 12 o'clock, every man who took the floor spoke on every subject he wished to speak on—from Madrid, Spain, to Washington, D. C.—things that have no more to do with the bill than the question, "Who struck Billy Patterson?" There was no complaint whatever. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] in charge of the bill never complained, the gentlemen who stand by him on that side of the House did not complain, but the minute a gentleman rises on this side and varies from the very rule they have permitted to be violated (according to their contention on that side) a point of order is made and they propose to shut him off. Suppose you do shut him down, what is the result? You, Mr. Chairman, are called upon to say that the rule that has generally prevailed that a member has a right to discuss things not pertinent to the amendment offered in Committee of the Whole shall be changed. Then all of that fictitious debate, or all of that debate which has been had for one hundred years since the organization of the Committee of the Whole, on a motion to strike out the last word, goes for naught.

I take it that if we enforce the ruling the Chairman is called upon to make now and prevent the gentleman from Maine from taking the floor and making a speech upon a subject not connected with the bill, he will hardly be able to open his mouth during the balance of this discussion. [Laughter.]

Sir, are you going to say that when a gentleman moves to strike out the last word that is all he shall discuss? If you do not say that, then you say that there are some things out of order that he may discuss, and you will determine arbitrarily what shall and what shall not be discussed under the rule.

Mr. HOPKINS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. By moving to strike out the last word, or the last two words, it changes the paragraph, and if a member speaks on the paragraph he is speaking to the amendment, is he not?

Mr. McMILLIN. The ruling you are asking the Chairman to enforce literally is that only the amendment under consideration shall be the subject of discussion. Refinement can not get rid of that.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does not the gentleman see that a motion to strike out the last word, or the last two words, changes the entire paragraph?

Mr. McMILLIN. It may or it may not.

Mr. HOPKINS (continuing). So that it brings the whole paragraph under the consideration of the committee, and if the gentleman speaks to the paragraph, he is speaking to the amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman is already trying to prepare the way to escape out of this evident entanglement. He is beginning to provide means by which the ruling you are asking the Chair to make shall not be enforced. It strikes me that if it is enforced in one case it shall be in the other; you can not give discretionary powers to the Chair and say that you will cut off one member and not cut off another. The House, with all its willingness to surrender its rights, would hardly be willing to make a surrender to that extent.

Mr. HOPKINS. The general practice has been that a motion to strike out has been treated as extending the time for discussing the paragraph or amendment under consideration, and it is an innovation to allow gentlemen to proceed as the gentleman from Montana is seeking to proceed this morning.

Mr. McMILLIN. Sir, it is not an innovation. You are the innovator. I need only paraphrase the gentleman's own remark by saying the motion to strike out the last word has always been accepted as a means of discussing anything a member desired in Committee of the Whole. Now you are asking to change that rule, and it seems to me that the committee ought to be slow to change it. I do not know whether it will do any good to raise my voice in a feeble way in this House against it, but I raise it anyhow. It is wrong and deserves condemnation.

Mr. HOPKINS. If it will not disturb the gentleman, I should like to make another suggestion. As I understand, an agreement was made between gentlemen on both sides of the House in regard to the limitation of general debate, so as to allow any gentleman that desired to make a set speech to have full opportunity for expressing his views. Now, the very object of entering into an arrangement of that kind was to provide against introducing into the discussion under the five-minute rule any speeches of the character of that which the gentleman from Montana proposes to make. I insist that it would have been fairer and better if the gentleman from Montana had a set speech of the character he now indicates, that he should have presented it to the Committee of the Whole under the general debate.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, to the last utterance of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] about the opportunity that my friend from Montana had to speak in general debate, I have only to reply that the same right existed as to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT]; yet when he was not discussing the bill, unanimous consent was given to extend his time. The gentleman from Illinois sat there, and not only heard the gentleman from Missouri, but applauded him. I do not complain of that; I say it was right; the sentiments of the gentleman from Missouri were patriotic. But I do insist that the same measure of justice shall be meted out to the two sides of this House.

Again, the gentleman has said that when a motion is made to strike out the last word, the whole paragraph comes under discussion, because such an amendment may change the whole paragraph; yet he has never seen a man rise in this House and show himself foolish enough to begin to discuss what effect the striking out of the last word will have on the paragraph. We may have to do it now under the proposed ruling. Thus you get into absurdities any way you go in undertaking to enforce this new construction of the rules. The old beaten path of allowing freedom of speech in this House ought to be followed, and the black flag ought to be raised against any other proposition. [Applause.]

And, sir, if there is any effort by enforcing this new ruling to interfere with freedom of speech here, gentlemen who are interested in maintaining free speech ought to hold gentlemen on the other side to a strict construction of their rules, by which they will be forced to take what they give to others.

Now, I want to progress with this bill as much as anybody. Naval appropriations should and must be made. But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], who talks so loudly in favor of the observance of the rules, will admit—and I am willing to put it to him whether he will not admit—that he has violated the rules of the House by bringing in this bill. Provision after provision has been incorporated in the bill, although known to be in violation of the fixed rules of the House. And, Mr. Chairman, I will put you on notice—and I suppose you have not heard it before—that you will be called upon to override the rulings of this committee and the House in order to pass some of the important appropriations that are in this bill.

We had better, if we want to have clear sailing, do justice to all and not undertake to bridle that freedom of speech for which our fathers died and which we ought to spend our lives in trying to preserve. [Applause.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard a moment upon this appeal. It is true that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was in the chair when I attempted to address the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule upon a subject which was foreign to the appropriation bill then under consideration. An appeal was taken; and the House held against me on that question. But, Mr. Chairman, I venture the assertion that there has not been a Chairman of any Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union other than that gentleman who has so held; and I want to call the attention of the Chair to a ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was under consideration on the 5th day of March, 1896.

The gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] was at that time addressing the House under the five-minute rule upon the action of President Cleveland in making certain remarks in New York concerning the Western States. The gentleman from Montana was called to order by Mr. Miles, then a Representative from the State of Maryland, and upon the point of order being raised, the Chair held that the utmost liberality of debate should be allowed under the five-minute rule, and overruled the point of order. An appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair, and the ruling was sustained. I desire now to read the exact point of order and the exact ruling of the Chair upon it.

Mr. VINCENT. Was that a Republican House?

Mr. SHAFROTH. That was a Republican House—it was in the Fifty-fourth Congress. I read from page 2503 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 28, part 3—proceedings of March 5, 1896.

Mr. BRUCKER. Who was the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN, was at that time in the chair.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I make the point that the remarks of the gentleman from Montana are not relevant to the matter pending before this committee, and I call for the reading of the rule on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. What rule does the gentleman desire to have read?

Mr. MILES. I do not remember the number of the rule, but it is the one which requires that remarks on this floor shall be relevant to the subject under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maryland that in the five-minute debate the largest liberty is accorded to gentlemen to discuss questions, and they are not held rigidly to the rule which he invokes.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. This is a liberty which I do not believe has ever been countenanced in the American Congress before. [Derisive laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is unnecessary. The question is, Shall the opinion of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the remarks which were then being made were absolutely and totally irrelevant to the measure which was pending before the House, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. They had no relation to any pending amendment, because the amendment which the gentleman from Montana had made was to strike out the last word. It was upon that amendment that he proposed to discuss President Cleveland's address in New York City, a discussion which was entirely foreign to the subject-matter. But the gentlemen on the other side of this House voted almost unanimously to sustain the Chair in permitting him to proceed.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] state who was in the chair at that time?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, at the risk of wasting time and prolonging this discussion unduly I want to say a word or two.

The general discussion of subjects foreign to bills under consideration in Committee of the Whole has grown up in this House on general appropriation bills because of the theory that the House was in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

As nearly as I can find out, it grew out of the practice formerly of referring the President's message to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and discussing, upon that reference, every subject that any member might have in his mind. That practice gradually extended to general debate on appropriation bills in the Committee of the Whole, and, as gentlemen say, it has often been indulged in under the five-minute rule; but when any member reads the rule for debate under the five-minute rule, he can not for a moment claim but that the rule itself confines the debate strictly to the explanation of the amendment which the member offers. Now, it has been objected here that a motion to strike out the last word can not be debated. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] says a man would be a fool to attempt to debate or to confine himself to that motion. Well, if this is so, then the motion itself must be a senseless motion, if a man can not say anything sensible upon such a motion as that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is a fiction.

Mr. PAYNE. But I do not agree with the gentleman from Tennessee that the motion means nothing. Generally the motion to strike out the last word, if it prevailed, would destroy the whole paragraph. It would be as effectual as though the gentleman moved to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will my friend permit me a question right there?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes; if you have not got through discussing this.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In your long experience have you ever heard a man, at any time, discuss the effect of that motion to strike out the last word of the paragraph?

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman would possess himself in patience, I think I would have covered that before I got through. The motion to strike out the last word would generally, if it prevailed, be as effectual as a motion to strike out the whole paragraph, or, in other words, the motion involves the whole paragraph. Now, a gentleman, under such a motion as that, can discuss anything in the paragraph to which that amendment refers. When gentlemen confine themselves to debating the paragraph, they confine themselves strictly within the language, within the strictest construction of the language, of the rule, and so every gentleman who has ever debated a motion to strike out the last word, which involves the whole paragraph, if he has confined himself to the paragraph in question, has confined himself strictly not only under the language of the rule, but has debated the amendment which he has offered.

Mr. HARTMAN. May I interrupt the gentleman? Do I understand the gentleman to say that every gentleman who debates the motion to strike out the last word confines himself to a discussion of the paragraph?

Mr. PAYNE. I thought I had made myself plain.

Mr. HARTMAN. I have been trying to hear the gentleman the best I could.

Mr. PAYNE. I said every time a gentleman spoke to a motion to strike out the last word, which motion, if it prevailed, would destroy the paragraph, and then has proceeded under the rule to explain his amendment, to say something germane to the amendment, he has talked about the paragraph and can discuss the whole paragraph.

Mr. HARTMAN. I did not understand the gentleman before, there is so much noise in this part of the Chamber.

Mr. PAYNE. It has been the practice, Mr. Chairman, for a great many years to discuss everything under the sun on a motion to strike out the last word, but it never has been in order, even although it has been the practice.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask him if the practice for a great many years does not of itself become the rule of procedure?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will remember that in the Fifty-first Congress the principal argument that was made against the change in the practices in the House of Representatives was that we were overturning the rules and precedents and rights of a hundred years; and now every gentleman who ever indulged in any of that kind of declamation is glad in his heart that we did overturn the rules and the practices of a hundred years——

Mr. BAILEY. And that is what you are going to do now—overturn the practice.

Mr. PAYNE. And that we got down to business in the House of Representatives, and the transaction of business.

Mr. BAILEY. Do I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to admit frankly that he is asking the Chair to overturn the practices of the House for a hundred years?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I think the gentleman from Texas is not so dull but what he can see what the gentleman from New York is saying. Now, Mr. Chairman, this practice of moving to strike out the last word is a practice which delays the proceedings of the House of Representatives as much as any of the practices of filibustering did prior to the Fifty-first Congress, as much as the absenting of members and refraining from voting, and all that sort of thing did prior to the Fifty-first Congress. The question is whether the House of Representatives will enforce its rules and stop this kind of delay in legislation. That was the question which was presented when I happened to be in the chair as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, a question raised by the gentleman in charge, I think, of the Indian appropriation bill for the first time. The rule was read. The rule seemed plain.

Mr. COX. I should like to ask the gentleman just one question. I have very great confidence in your judgment about this matter. Now let me call your attention to one thing. A gentleman is speaking under the five-minute rule, and the question of order is raised that the remarks are not pertinent to that section, and the Chair decides that they are not. Now, what do you do with what he has said?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I never had any supervision of the RECORD myself.

Mr. COX. Then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] answered that question by saying——

Mr. PAYNE. You are getting onto a new question now.

Mr. COX. By saying you would strike it from the RECORD. Now, does not the whole question reach down to this, that the Chairman decides how a man shall speak, if that is so?

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will possess himself in patience for a moment. Of course the gentleman understands that when a gentleman is called to order and the Chair decides that he is not in order, it is the duty of that gentleman to take his seat, and he can not proceed until the House allows him to proceed in order.

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. That is all, so far as that is concerned; I do not supervise the RECORD, not even my own speeches.

Mr. COX. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. PAYNE. But to come back to what I was talking about. The gentleman is trying to lead me away.

Mr. COX. I am glad to hear that you do not indorse the views of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PAYNE. The rule seems to be very plain, and after consideration of the subject, because it was not the first time I had thought about it, I believed it was my duty, as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, when that objection was made, to rule in accordance with the rules of the House, and I did so; and there was a debate and an appeal, and on the vote the Chair was sustained. Now, that ruling has been repeated time and again since. I have made it in the chair myself. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], I think, has made it. Other gentlemen who have occupied the chair in Committee of the Whole have made it. The gentleman who is now in the chair [Mr. SHERMAN] has sustained it before on other bills, and I think but once has there ever been an appeal taken from the decision of the Chairman on that subject.

The House received it as a matter of course, and I supposed that every gentleman who had carefully read the rules had come to the conclusion that the rule was so plain on that subject that there was no use of further controversy or of trying to get back to the old order of things. As I say, the rule is plain. It seems to me this House ought to enforce its rules whenever they are invoked. Of course the Chairman is not going to call a member to order. The Chairman never does call a member to order, or very seldom, when he is indulging in remarks that are out of order. But whenever a member brings it to the attention of the Chair, whenever a member of the committee or of the House brings any point of order to the attention of the Chair, it is the duty of the Chair then and there to enforce the rules as he understands them.

Another ruling that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] referred to was a ruling that was made when a bill was up for discussion under general debate, it being a private bill. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] desired to make a public speech, a political speech——

Mr. HANDY. And he did so.

Mr. PAYNE. And was indulging in that kind of a speech. The gentleman had gone on for some time. The attention of the Chair was not called to it by any member. Finally the gentleman in charge of the bill made the point of order that the gentleman was not talking to the bill. We were not in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but we were in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, on a private bill, and when the point was raised, there seemed to be but one conclusion to arrive at. The gentleman was not discussing the bill, and there was no rule that would allow him to go into general debate upon other subjects upon a private bill, and the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HANDY. In the case to which the gentleman refers the gentleman from Delaware repeats now what he said to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] when he was in the chair, namely, that the gentleman from Delaware was speaking to the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the House afterwards indulged the gentleman to the fullest extent, and he occupied half an hour, making the same speech, and he vindicated the decision of the Chair at least and the decision of the committee, in that he did not talk to the bill at all during that speech.

Mr. HANDY. That was a matter of a difference of opinion between the Chair and myself.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] says that was decided by a tie vote in the committee, the Chair voting to sustain his own decision.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And if the gentleman will excuse me for the interruption, if the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] had thought it proper and right to vote to sustain himself the Chair never would have had the opportunity to sustain himself by voting on a tie vote. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. The point here is different. If the gentleman from Delaware wants to make a speech, I will yield to him.

Mr. HANDY. I would like to repeat a little of the history of that transaction. The gentleman from Delaware refrained from voting as a matter of delicacy on a question between himself and the Chair; but when the Chair announced the tie vote and proceeded to vote in his own favor, the gentleman from Delaware, with a good deal of lung power, tried to vote the other way, and the gentleman in the chair [Mr. PAYNE] did not hear him.

Mr. PAYNE. Very probably. If the gentleman has said all he wants to say, I would like to proceed.

Mr. HANDY. That is a complete chapter at the present.

Mr. PAYNE. No; I will complete the chapter when you get through. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Now, upon that special point of order there was a strict party vote on each side of the question. The Chair had just decided the question, and decided the point of order against the gentleman speaking on subjects foreign to the bill, and the occupant of the chair had no hesitancy in voting to sustain his own decision. The rules had not changed, and the debate in the Committee of the Whole did not show any reason why the ruling should be changed. That is all there was in that precedent. It does not apply to this, which relates simply to the five-minute debate upon the paragraph.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized.

Mr. HANDY. I want to be heard on the appeal before the question is put, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. It became my duty to call this gentleman to order.

Mr. HARTMAN rose.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not think he ought to disturb——

Mr. HARTMAN. I do not think I am making as much disturbance as the gentleman is. I desire to be recognized upon this appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is the duty of this House to attend to public business. The public business before this committee now, and the only public business to which it can possibly apply itself under the rules, is the consideration and disposal of the appropriation bill for the naval establishment, for which this country is anxiously awaiting. It is perfectly obvious that the procedure to which we have been subjected during the last three-quarters of an hour is not in the interest of the transaction of public business. We are here to do business, and, taking in consideration that time was awarded for this debate yesterday to the full extent requested on that side——

Mr. HANDY. Not at all.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. To the last minute required——

Mr. HANDY. Not at all.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am talking about the agreement that I perfected with gentlemen upon that side. We ought to be able to proceed to-day, in regular order, and without obstruction, and without filibustering, to dispose of this great public measure of vital importance to the interests of this Government. I ask the Chair to submit this question and let us decide this appeal now and for all times that when the Committee of the Whole are engaged in the transaction of legitimate business they will not permit it to be obstructed and delayed through the performance of men infusing political harangues that are manifestly out of order, and, when so declared, arrogantly claim in defiance of the rule that they are in order, and then proceed to discuss some moot questions of parliamentary law in order to obstruct the public business. Let us have a vote.

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Chairman, I move that since this has been discussed, we now proceed to a vote.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move to close debate on this appeal.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I raise the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I make the point of order that you can not close debate on an appeal.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move that this debate be closed.

Mr. BAILEY. You can not close debate on an appeal.

Mr. HARTMAN. Am I not to be recognized?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This question is not debatable.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The motion is not in order.

Mr. BAILEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BAILEY. I rose to make the point of order that under the rules it is permissible to move to close debate on the paragraph, but not upon an appeal.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is clearly the case.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the plain rule.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I understand it is not, under the practice of the House.

A MEMBER. Who told you that?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I obtained the information from one better informed than myself, not being so conceited as some gentlemen whom I might name. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas to make a point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. My point of order was that debate upon a paragraph may be closed by a vote in the Committee of the Whole, but the Committee of the Whole has no power to close debate except upon a paragraph. The question before the committee is not a paragraph, but an appeal; and the very fact that the Committee of the Whole by express rule is authorized to close debate on a paragraph is proof that without that authority they could not close debate at all.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that it must——

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I may be pardoned, I desire to suggest that the matter of appeal is wholly within the discretion of the Chair and not subject to the rule.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then I ask as speedy a ruling as possible. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, there is no better settled practice, though this is not a rule, that the discussion of an appeal is wholly within the discretion of the Chair. If the Chair wants to hear a member five minutes or one minute, he can do so. If he wants to hear any member debate it, he can do so.

Now, as long as there is some gentleman on the floor who thinks that he has some information bearing in some way upon the question before the committee, I have never known the Chairman abruptly to close debate and make his ruling. The Chairman generally hears from members who, in a respectful way, state that they desire to offer something which they think sheds some light on the pending question. As long as gentlemen address themselves to the Chair and make that statement, I think the present occupant of the chair will hear a reasonable discussion upon it. It may become necessary sometimes for the Chairman to shut off debate, but that has not arisen yet. The time may come, Mr. Chairman—and I say this is a most important question—when the position of the two parties may be changed very radically. At the next session of this House I submit that the gentlemen on that side, now in the majority, if they become the minority in the next House, will raise a very different voice from the voice they now raise if it shall be undertaken to suppress debate and enforce the rule they now ask to enforce here.

Now, upon the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee must be proceeding by unanimous consent, for this motion is not debatable.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I submit that it is in order——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the motion is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But I submit that the motion is not in order. The Chair can close debate, but there is no motion in this committee, and none under the rules of the House, by which any gentleman can close debate on an appeal. Why, if that was the case, you would not be permitted as a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to hear any views upon the subject. The most ignorant, if there be any such on the floor—I will not say that, but the least informed member could take away from the Chair the opportunity of hearing debate by simply moving to close debate on a proposition that the Chair might desire to hear, and yet he would be precluded by the motion to close debate on an appeal.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, in all candor, if he believes that a ruling which would permit the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] to go on and make the kind of speech he is making would conduce to the speedy disposition of this great public measure?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will answer the gentleman frankly. I was not in and I was not fortunate enough to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Montana——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It had no relation whatever to the subject-matter of this bill——

Mr. RICHARDSON (continuing). And therefore I can not express an opinion——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am answering the question. I am quite willing to say that not one-tenth of the time would have been consumed by the gentleman from Montana if the gentleman from Maine had allowed the gentleman from Montana to go on that has been occupied in this discussion.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Is the gentleman from Tennessee willing to answer candidly the question I asked him?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; I will answer further by saying that you will never save time by an effort to enforce a rule so harsh, so contrary to all the practices and precedents of this House for one hundred years, as the one you now seek to invoke. It is absolutely impossible in any House to suppress debate in that way. I have been a member of this House for nearly fourteen years, I passed through the stormy scenes of the Fifty-first Congress, and I never saw any attempt on the part of the Chairman there to suppress debate like this under the five-minute rule. You can not do it; you must permit some reasonable debate. The gentleman says that yesterday we agreed to limit debate and that we were given all we wished. There was a compromise agreement, but the gentleman has no right to say that we were given all the time we desired under that agreement. It was a compromise. Now, I hope that no such rule as that now asked for will be enforced. I venture to say that no political party ever did enforce any such rule, and I venture to say that the Republican party, if they attempt to enforce it now, will regret it before this session is over, and they will surely regret it before the next one closes its labors. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to make a ruling. He has heard all the discussion he cares to upon this point of order. Beyond question the gentleman from Tennessee is correct, providing he was speaking to the question of a point of order. It always has been held that the Chair can conclude discussion of a point of order when he desires, when his mind is satisfied upon the point, for that is the real purpose of permitting the discussion; but it does not necessarily follow that the Chair can bring to an end debate upon an appeal from the decision already made. Discussion in that case is not to satisfy the mind of the Chair, but of the members of the committee. But without passing upon whether or not the Chair can bring that debate to a conclusion, the Chair does hold that it is within the power of the committee to bring the debate to a conclusion, and therefore will put the motion of the gentleman from New York, that debate be now closed.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARTMAN. I happen to be the party directly interested in the matter which is contained in this appeal, and I want to know whether under the rules of the House the party who takes the appeal is not permitted to close the debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The party who took the appeal was the gentleman from Texas, and he has discussed it fully. It is not a proper parliamentary inquiry under the circumstances.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask permission that I may close the debate on this question.

Mr. STEELE. Let us have the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from New York that debate now close on the appeal.

The question being taken; there were on a division (called for by Mr. BAILEY)—ayes 111, noes 95.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine and Mr. BAILEY were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 129, noes 106.

So the motion to close debate was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, there were on a division (called for by Mr. BAILEY)—ayes 120, noes 92.

Mr. BAILEY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine and Mr. BAILEY were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 116, noes 99.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the gentleman from Montana be permitted to proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the gentleman from Montana be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I think that ought to be permitted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Of course that means that the gentleman proceed under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, referring to the amendment which I have offered to this bill, it being an amendment to strike out the last two words, as an amendment to the motion to strike out one last word of the paragraph of this bill, I desire to say that the proposition which makes it entirely proper and appropriate to the present discussion is this, that if the bill itself pertains to the state of the Union and either adds or detracts from its welfare, then the paragraph pertains to it, and if the paragraph pertains to it, the last word pertains to it, and if that pertains to it, the last two words pertain to it.

Now, in support of that amendment, I desire to submit to the House about nine lines, to which I ask attention, and which I have prepared:

Following the instructions of those who dictate our policies, control our conventions, and manage our administration, we bow in worshipful adoration at the feet of Grover the Fat—him who gave us wisdom and an honest financial policy——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana will suspend.

Mr. HARTMAN continued speaking during the rapping of the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine calls the gentleman from Montana to order. The gentleman from Montana will suspend his remarks. The gentleman from Maine will state his point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, and insist that the language which the gentleman persisted in using after he was called to order shall not be printed in the RECORD. I make the point of order that he is not proceeding in order, but is abusing the privilege accorded to him by this committee by persisting in that which the committee has just decided by a vote to be out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BAILEY. On that point of order I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been decided.

Mr. BAILEY. On that point of order I desire to be heard.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I make the point of order on the gentleman from Texas that he is making a dilatory proposition.

Mr. BAILEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. This same proposition has just been fully discussed; the Chair has once passed upon it, and the Committee of the Whole has passed upon the decision of the Chair, so that the Chair prefers to hear no further discussion.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to occupy but a moment or two. I want to call the attention of the Chair to a matter which I think bears upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. On that statement the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to remind the Chair that in the Fifty-fourth Congress the gentleman from Montana was delivering a more bitter invective against Mr. Cleveland, who was then President, than he has uttered here to-day against either Mr. Cleveland or the Republican party; yet while he was assailing Mr. Cleveland, who was then President, and a point of order was made by a gentleman who then occupied a seat on this side of the Chamber, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, a distinguished Republican, now, as then, a member of this House, overruled the point of order and declared that the gentleman from Montana could proceed. He did proceed; and in the RECORD of that Congress there appears that speech, a more terrific arraignment of Mr. Cleveland than anything the gentleman has uttered now.

Is the Republican party willing to say to the country that when the gentleman from Montana denounced Mr. Cleveland he should be permitted to proceed, but when, consistently with his own course, he turns and denounces the Republican party for the same crime, he shall be silenced by the majority of this House? [Applause.] It is a poor rule that does not work both ways; and if it was not an infraction of the rules of this House in the Fifty-fourth Congress to denounce the then President of the United States, it certainly ought to be permissible now that he is in retirement, where I hope he will remain forever, to put his name in the RECORD, without a motion to expunge it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I make the point of order that that motion is a dilatory motion, clearly, the House having just decided the identical question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains that point.

Mr. BAILEY. The point now is that the gentleman from Maine moves that what the gentleman from Montana has uttered shall not become a part of the RECORD. That is not the question that the committee passed on a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the point which the Chair passed on.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is not the point of order I raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has passed upon the identical question. It was passed upon half an hour ago, and it was from that ruling that the appeal was taken.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Chair does not respond to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, or to his motion, that the remarks of the gentleman from Montana shall not become a part of the RECORD.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I did not move that they be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman certainly did.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I said I demanded that it should be done, in the discretion of those having charge of the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the committee be in order? Will all gentlemen be seated?

Mr. BAILEY. Including the Chair. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides that the Chair shall stand while making a decision. The Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Maine. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal of the gentleman from Texas, for the reason that the identical question was decided but a few moments ago, an appeal taken, and the committee sustained the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. And being decided wrongly then, would be decided wrongly again!

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HARTMAN. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. DINGLEY. I make the point of order that no question of personal privilege can be raised in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that no question of personal privilege can be raised in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is my point, that no question of personal privilege can be raised in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit that that question has been heretofore decided by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] when he was occupying the chair, and decided the other way.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the Chair will give me a moment, I think there will be no difficulty——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A very bitter discussion upon this question arose in the Fifty-first Congress. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole decided, over the objection made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that where the matter of privilege arose in the transactions of the Committee of the Whole the right to raise a question of privilege appertains, and upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair the decision was sustained.

I think that the Chair will see the propriety of that rule. I have no pride in upholding that ruling, but the Chair will see that to rule otherwise would be to make it impossible for a member charged with some misconduct in the very conduct of the business of the Committee of the Whole to once purge himself under the cover and protection of a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Texas the reference to that decision in the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. BAILEY. The case to which I desired to call the attention of the Chair was the decision by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to which he has referred.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Drawing the distinction between the ordinary question of privilege that comes from outside utterances or circumstances and narrowing it down to something that happened in the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is a proper distinction. I do not think that a gentleman would have the right to rise in the Committee of the Whole, say his character as a member of the House had been assaulted, and occupy the time of the committee in that way; but this grows out of a transaction in the committee itself.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I was going to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if the distinction which the gentleman from Ohio has made is a true distinction, and that right does exist, then the Chair will have to hear the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] before he can determine whether it falls within the rule or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would have to take the gentleman's statement as to whether or not he desired to speak upon such a matter; and of course the Chair would always do that with any member of the House or of the committee.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman proceeds the Chair will rule, complying with the precedent, without looking it up, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the gentleman from Texas state was made in the Fifty-first Congress. He will be governed by that ruling, and will hear the gentleman from Montana, provided he desires to speak upon a matter of personal privilege which has arisen now.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, the present contention pending before the House has assumed to this extent a personal relation to myself that it involves a criticism on the part of the House of matters which I have been presenting to it; and I submit to the Chair that every single word that has been uttered by myself here to-day has full and complete justification and precedent, from the time of the establishment of our Government down until the ruling on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in the Fifty-fourth Congress. And, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that does not raise a question of personal privilege.

Mr. HARTMAN. I intend to confine myself to the question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not yet spoken to the question of personal privilege.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine rises here and states that the remarks that I am submitting are submitted for the purpose of interfering with the passage of the great naval appropriation bill, of which he is in charge.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, is that a question of personal privilege?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is not a question of personal privilege.

Mr. HARTMAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I intend to make my statement, and I do not intend to be intimidated by the gentleman from Maine or any other gentleman. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please be in order.

Mr. PAYNE. I insist that the rule shall be enforced; that the gentleman be obliged to take his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana, having been called to order, will take his seat.

Mr. BAILEY. The words must be taken down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman upon the theory that he desired to speak to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BAILEY. A question of order, Mr. Chairman. Before the gentleman is compelled to resume his seat the words to which objection has been made ought to be taken down.

Mr. PAYNE. Not at all. There was no demand to take his words down.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I submit that it is not in order to call a member to order and force him to resume his seat and to listen to any statement of the Chair until the Chair has decided that the gentleman is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had decided that the gentleman was not in order, because he was not speaking to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BAILEY. I had not understood the Chair so to decide.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes; the Chair twice stated to the gentleman that he was not speaking to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BAILEY. I was absent from my seat for a moment, having gone to the cloakroom with a headache.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, one word. A parliamentary inquiry.

I would like to have the gentleman from Texas hear what I say. It would not do to incorporate that sort of practice, where a member calls another member to order, and have a decision of the Chair without the language being taken down.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Otherwise you would have nothing to decide except what, in the mind of the Chair, are the unparliamentary remarks of the member; and therefore, upon his being challenged, the rule and practice is that the language is taken down, and then the Chair rules upon it.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all we contend for.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio confuses two different cases. When a member is called to order, the rule prescribes that he shall take his seat, and shall not be allowed to proceed unless some other member move that he proceed in order. That is one case. Another case is where a party is called to order and his words demanded to be taken down. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a ruling in the Manual. It reads as follows——

Several MEMBERS. What page?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Page 457 of the Manual:

If a member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the committee shall rise and the Chairman report to the House the language taken down.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a different case.

Mr. DALZELL. That is not this case. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana rose to a question of personal privilege. If the gentleman will confine himself to the question of personal privilege, he then can have the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; he proceeded without permission of the committee, having twice been called to order, and twice ruled out of order and took his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. If that point of order is raised, it must be sustained.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BAILEY. I make the motion that he be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. DALZELL. I hope that will be voted down.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DALZELL. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 110.

Mr. BAILEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. If I understood it correctly, the motion we just voted on was a motion to allow the gentleman from Montana to proceed in order.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Therefore the vote is that he can not proceed in order. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is stating a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It can not be.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. The vote is that he can not proceed in order. Is that what the vote was?

The CHAIRMAN. The vote that he shall proceed in order is negatived.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Then he can not proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks for tellers.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Another parliamentary inquiry.

The question was taken; and tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas, Mr. BAILEY, and the gentleman from Maine, Mr. BOUTELLE, will take their places as tellers.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Chair to appoint my colleague, Mr. COOPER, to act as teller.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas, Mr. COOPER, will take his place as teller.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 104.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it; the motion is lost; and the Clerk will read.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit that there are two amendments to be disposed of. The gentleman from Montana has two amendments.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask for a vote on those amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The first is an amendment to the amendment to strike out the last two words.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. HARTMAN. Division.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I make the point that the demand is dilatory.

Mr. BAILEY. I suppose that we are always entitled to a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not sustain that point of order.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 66.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that that demand is dilatory, and made for the purpose of delay. The gentleman voted in the affirmative himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that even the Speaker of this House held that the demand for yeas and nays is not subject to the point of order that it is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is upon the pending amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. I want the Chair to specify in the record of this House——

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. What the decision is.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BAILEY. And what I desire to inquire is, if gentlemen will possess their souls in patience, if the Chair has stated the ground upon which he overruled the demand for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. It is one the Chair could not very well answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The CHAIRMAN. It has once been stated.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. HARTMAN. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 99.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand tellers.

Mr. DINGLEY. I make the point of order that that motion is also dilatory.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, upon that I desire——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word, if the gentleman from Texas will allow me. The motion is to strike out the last two words—a pro forma amendment, an amendment that is invariably withdrawn in Committee of the Whole—and it shows upon its face that all of this is simply done for delay.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to remind the Chair that the gentleman from New York has declared that striking out the last word might change the whole effect of the law. I desire further to say that you would, if you sustained that point of order, destroy the last safeguard of the minority in this House. [Applause.]

A dishonest man and dishonest men have been in the chair. [Applause.] A dishonest man might deliberately make a false count, and if you deny the right to have that count verified by tellers, you will destroy the last safeguard of the minority of this House. It is a very much more serious question than the mere matter of filibustering. I am free to say that I started out to consume double as much time as was denied to the gentleman from Montana, and I intend to do it every time the majority refuse a reasonable time for debate; but we have reached a point that presents a graver issue.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear any further discussion.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. Is not the demand for tellers a questioning of the Chair itself and the Chair's decision? Does it not call in question the count of the Chair; and when that is brought into question, shall the Chair say there shall not be a revision of that count?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not presenting a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLAND. I present it as a parliamentary inquiry, if the Chair does not know that calling for tellers is a questioning of the count? I say that no self-respecting House will submit to any such ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will please be in order. Will all gentlemen be seated and will the Committee of the Whole come to order. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to discuss the point of order briefly. I should not do so did I not think this a very important question, involving the rights of the House and the integrity of its proceedings. While this may be an insignificant amendment—I will not discuss that, and this may not be a momentous time; I will not discuss that—the rules of the House and the Constitution of the United States have provided certain muniments for the ascertainment of the will of this committee and the House. One of them is that when sitting in the House the right to demand the yeas and nays exists with the members and can not be cut off. That has never been denied during the history of the Government.

There has never been a suggestion that it should be denied. Furthermore, in all the time that we have had questions of filibustering presented during the occupancy of the chair by the present able Speaker, and during the occupancy of the chair by Speaker Carlisle and Speaker Keifer, even this right to say that the result announced was not the true result was never denied; it has always been conceded that after there had been an aye-and-no vote, it was the privilege of any member to call for a recapitulation of the vote, although it took as much time as it did to take the vote by tellers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, concurrently with this right to have a vote by yeas and nays in the House has been this immemorial right to have a verification of the vote by tellers in Committee of the Whole. The former was wisely instituted for the purpose of enabling members to make a record, and in Committee of the Whole, in absence of the record, it was the right to question the count of the Chairman as accuracy by tellers. This was never denied. I can not see how that right can ever be surrendered by a self-respecting House of Representatives without the destruction of one of its most important prerogatives. And if it is to be done, although this action may not be momentous, although the question here may be settled one way or the other and the country not go to wreck, how can we tell that the action of to-day will not be a precedent for to-morrow and the custom for succeeding time?

If the Chair can refuse tellers in one case, he can in all cases, and the will of the Chairman becomes the law of the committee. All a man has to do is to get in the Chair and his will will be law. He can put any kind of a corrupt job into an appropriation bill that his cupidity or want of principle may suggest or tolerate. [Applause.]

Sir, I take great delight in saying that I do not believe that the present occupant of the chair is capable of any such conduct. Were he absent I would say more in commendation of him and of his usual conduct of the affairs both of the House and of the Chair. But this important right of the minority should not be surrendered without protest, and will not be surrendered without my denouncing it as a wrong that has had no precedent in this or in any other House. Our system of government is a wise one; let us preserve it. The minority have rights; let us observe them. You had better spend hours or even days in debate and delay this bill a few hours than to pass it by reckless, unjust revolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I am not quite willing that this matter should go to a decision upon the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN]. I think that in the warmth of his argument he has forgotten that the real point here is not the question of verifying the vote upon the motion to strike out the last word. The rule of the House has conferred upon the presiding officer the right to say when a motion is dilatory and to refuse in that event to recognize it. Now, the motion to strike out was made as a mere pro forma matter. Whatever may be said about the effect of the amendment, we understand—and that is the practice of the House—that these pro forma amendments are usually made to be withdrawn.

Now, it is the duty of the Chair to say when a motion is dilatory; and it does not make any difference what that motion is. We are conforming to the rules of the House. The rules of the House do not say that a decision that a motion is dilatory shall be made only upon a motion to adjourn or only upon a motion to appeal or only upon a motion to take a recess, but any motion that is made for the mere purpose of delay may be thus condemned by the Chair.

The essence, therefore, of this controversy is this: It is not a question whether or not the count of the Chair upon this question was truly made or was accidentally wrong. The real question is, Was the motion made in good faith or was it dilatory? Now, can the gentleman from Tennessee say that a motion for tellers to verify the count of the Chair on a motion to strike out the last word—a word which I presume the gentleman can not now give, nor the paragraph to which the motion applied—will the gentleman say that the Chair is usurping authority when he says that a demand for tellers upon that kind of a motion, under the present condition of things, is a dilatory motion? If the Chair so decides, and the conscience of the Chair has been concurred in by the judgment of the House, that, it seems to me, conforms strictly to the rules of the House; and the gentleman is assailing the rules when he assails the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]—and I ask it for information, because I was not in the House on the occasion to which I am about to refer—whether it is not true that, pending a bill to reimburse the Methodist Publication Company, the point was made, upon a demand for tellers, that the demand was dilatory, and the point was overruled by the Chair? I am informed by those around me that that is true. I was not in the House at the time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know whether it is true or not; but that does not affect this question. The duty of the Chair on that occasion was to decide the question, and having decided it, he had conformed to the rule of the House. The duty of the Chair in this case is similar.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Chair at that time overruled the point of order made upon a demand for tellers on the ground that the point of order that such a demand is dilatory can not be made, just as the Speaker of the House overruled a point of order that a demand for the yeas and nays was dilatory, holding that such a point of order can not be made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The yeas and nays are provided for in the Constitution, and no rule of the House can affect that proposition.

Mr. BAILEY. As I have said to the gentleman from Ohio, I was not in the House on the occasion to which I have referred, but my information was that this very question was raised and decided as I have stated.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not remember as to that; but I have this to say, that the ruling on a question of this kind depends upon the surrounding conditions at the time. If the Chairman made a ruling of the character which the gentleman states on the occasion referred to, and put it upon the ground that a demand for tellers can not under any circumstances be refused, that is one thing; but if the Chair simply overruled the point of order, that is altogether another thing, because generally in so ruling the Chair simply says, "My mind has not met the mind of the gentleman who has made the point of order, and I can not say that this is a dilatory motion."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question we are discussing?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As I understand, the point of order has been decided by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that he was ready to rule; but he has not decided the point of order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio this question, because it seems to me important to see what would be the result of these rulings before we establish them: Suppose that upon the question of an important appropriation going into a general appropriation bill the Chair should refuse to entertain a demand for tellers, what would be the remedy?

Mr. GROSVENOR. My remedy would be an appeal to the conscience of the House. I would make a motion to rise——

Mr. McMILLIN. That is the very point to which I wanted to bring the gentleman. Suppose the same spirit that induced the Chairman to refuse to entertain the first motion should prompt him to refuse to entertain the motion that the committee rise, how would the gentleman get at "the conscience of the House?"

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am trying to appeal to the conscience of the gentleman from Tennessee, who knows that this is a dilatory motion.

Mr. McMILLIN. I know that this right to demand tellers has never been interfered with before.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will indulge the Chair for one moment. The Chair has no desire to make a ruling which will cut off any member from the exercise of an honest right, and if the gentleman from Texas assures the Chair that in good faith he makes this demand for tellers, the Chair will request the gentleman who raised the point of order to withdraw it.

Mr. JETT. Is it to be presumed that any member on this floor makes any motion otherwise than in good faith?

The CHAIRMAN. Not when he disclaims it.

Mr. BAILEY. I resent, as an insult to a member of the House, the demand on the part of the occupant of the chair that he shall file an inventory of his motives. Sir, I am exercising my right, and neither you nor the power behind you can compel me to stand here and say what my motives are. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Because it does not require any statement. We understand exactly what they are. They are to obstruct this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The committee will please be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A point of order on the gentleman from Maine——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, and does not care to hear any further discussion.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to be heard on one subject. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I desire to make a point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. HOPKINS. The suggestion which I desire to make is——

The CHAIRMAN. Before anything further is done the committee will please come to order.

Mr. HOPKINS. That suggestion—— [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. It is not only the privilege but the duty of the Chair, as it seems to me, at all times when a question of order is raised, to consider the circumstances under which it has been raised. Here a purely formal amendment to strike out the last word is made——

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to make his statement? The vote is taken upon that amendment. The vote shows that the Chair is not likely to have been mistaken, the total being 62 to 99. It is not so close as to indicate that the Chair erred in his count or in his conclusion as to whether the motion is carried or lost.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who made the demand for tellers, stated in his remarks that he had started out this afternoon for the purpose of consuming time.

Before taking his seat he had not stated that he had any other purpose at the present time.

Mr. BAILEY. I am unwilling to allow that statement to stand unchallenged, because I distinctly said that we had now met a question vastly more important than anything that had gone before it, and that the denial of a demand for tellers was the destruction of the last safeguard of the minority in this House, and I insisted upon it as the right of the minority.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair attempted to ascertain from the gentleman whether or not he made the demand in good faith, and the gentleman declined to answer the question.

Mr. BAILEY. I do. I now resent any demand on the part of the Chair to have me stand here under cross-examination and state what my motives are. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now conclude his statement. The gentleman having stated some time ago that he started out this afternoon for the purpose of consuming time, and as it seems perfectly apparent that the demand is made clearly for the purpose of consuming time, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DALZELL. I make the point of order that that is dilatory, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

A MEMBER. You can not do that in Committee of the Whole. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania raises the point that the appeal is dilatory.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to refer the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] to the Hon. John Wanamaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman from Texas will be in order for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One point on that, if the Chair pleases——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the committee please be in order?

The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk will read.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one thing upon that——

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to quote from the gentleman from Ohio, that we should appeal to the conscience of the House.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Contingent, Navy: For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department, or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices, at Washington, D. C., $7,000.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana moves to strike out the last word. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] The committee will be in order.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for thirty minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for twenty minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes beyond the five-minute limit.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. HARTMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes that I am allotted under the rule, I desire to call attention to a few remarks which have been submitted here this afternoon by the gentleman from Maine in charge of this bill. The gentleman from Maine suggests that the remarks that have been intended to be submitted by myself, and that have been cut off by him, were intended to prevent and delay the passage of this great naval appropriation bill. That statement is absolutely without any foundation whatever.

On the contrary, I stand here ready to cast my vote in favor of the bill which the gentleman has presented here to this body; but he is the man who is responsible for delay. Just two hours and four minutes ago I rose here and asked permission of this House to occupy the time of the House for a few minutes. The gentleman from Maine interposed his objection—interposed that objection, Mr. Chairman, after the same right had been accorded to members upon that side of the Chamber without any objection whatever from members upon this side.

I submit, sir, that it is an unjust discrimination against members of this body. I have occupied the time of the House but twenty-seven minutes prior to this time during this session of Congress. Only the other day—I invite the attention of the gentleman from Maine to the fact, for if I make a mistake I want to be corrected—only the other day, when the Post-Office appropriation bill was up, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], if I am not sadly mistaken, gave us to understand that great latitude would be accorded in the debate upon this great bill. Now we are met with the denial of all right to debate it at all.

Mr. Chairman, I intend to continue until the gentleman from Maine and the other side of the House understand that they can not throttle free speech in this body. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is all there is at stake here to-day. It is not a matter of the little amendment which I propose. It is not a matter of whether I can be heard or not. The question is, Can any man be heard here under the ruling which has obtained here this afternoon? That is all there is.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And can the House be appealed to?

Mr. HARTMAN. And I intend to continue this matter just so long as this side of the House will stand by its leader, Mr. BAILEY, and continue it until we ascertain whether or not there is only one side of the House that can be heard, or whether this side has any rights here at all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I intend to present another plank of the platform, to which I have no doubt objection will be made. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] We have a serious apprehension of a growing disposition of the American people to investigate public questions——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana will suspend.

Mr. HARTMAN continued to read, amid great confusion, the Chairman rapping for order.

Mr. HARTMAN. Did the Chair call me to order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requested the gentleman from Montana to suspend.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I insist upon order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. So does the Chair.

Mr. HARTMAN. There is so much confusion that it is difficult for me to hear the Chair now. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine calls the gentleman to order. He raises the point of order that he is not speaking to the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the gentleman from Montana be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is a dilatory proposition, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DINGLEY. The rule permits no such motion as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine raises the point of order that the rule permits no such motion.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until the Chair looks at the rule.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will permit the Chair to look the rule over.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Then it has come to the point that we can not be permitted even an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will permit the Chair to read the rule, he will hear his inquiry. [After a pause.] What is the inquiry?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The inquiry is this: The Chair decides that the gentleman can not proceed out of order; the House has decided that he can not proceed in order. Will you please inform us how we can proceed? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] We can not proceed out of order or in order. How are we to proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not attempt to educate the gentleman on the rules of the House. The question is on the motion that the gentleman from Montana be permitted to proceed in order, and the gentleman from Maine raises the point of order on that.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that paragraph 4 of the rule be read, so that we may understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order; in which case he shall immediately sit down, unless permitted, on motion of another member, to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case without debate; if the decision is in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise; and, if the case require it, he shall be liable to censure or such punishment as the House may deem proper.

Mr. DINGLEY. The motion is not in order.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, the very rule that requires the member to resume his seat is coupled with this, and it is the same sentence, unless upon motion of some member he shall be permitted to proceed.

Mr. DALZELL. Be permitted "to explain."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Be permitted "to explain."

Mr. BAILEY. To proceed with his explanation.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no; that is too thin.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, the fact is that motion is always that a member be permitted to proceed in order; but I do not intend that the gentleman from Maine shall afford the Chair an opportunity to find a technical escape from my motion; and apprehending that the Chair will decide as the gentleman from Maine has requested him to decide, that the motion that I have made is not in order, I withdraw that and move that the gentleman from Montana be permitted to explain; and I suppose that that motion is so plainly in order that even the gentleman from Maine will not ask the Chair to overrule it.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the gentleman be allowed to proceed to explain.

Mr. LACEY. I make the point of order that substantially the same question as this has been passed upon by the committee by a vote.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman now makes a different motion, that he shall proceed now to make an explanation. The gentleman from Montana attempted to read a certain article that was not in order; and now he attempts to read the same again.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is mistaken; it is not the same at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] be allowed to proceed to explain.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY), there were—ayes 101, noes 121.

Mr. BAILEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman!

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine and Mr. BAILEY as tellers.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be excused, and that the Chair will appoint my colleague, Mr. COOPER.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. COOPER of Texas.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, before I cast my vote, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing.

Mr. COX. It was not dividing when I made my application.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers had been ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 104, noes 116.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN].

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move to close the debate on the pending paragraph.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY) there were—ayes 103, noes 95.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOPKINS made the point of order that the demand for tellers was dilatory, but subsequently withdrew it.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine and Mr. COOPER of Texas tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 109, noes 100.

So the motion to close debate was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

Transportation, recruiting, and contingent: For expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; advertising for men and boys, and all other expenses attending the recruiting for the naval service, and for the transportation of enlisted men and boys at home and abroad; for heating apparatus for receiving and training ships, and extra expenses thereof; for freight, telegraphing on public business, postage on letters sent abroad, forriage, ice, apprehension of deserters and stragglers, continuous-service certificates, discharges, good-conduct badges, and medals for boys, schoolbooks for training ships, packing boxes and materials, and other contingent expenses and emergencies arising under cognizance of the Bureau of Navigation, unforeseen, and impossible to classify, $45,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be closed on this paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How can anything be closed before it has been opened? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. We will show you in a minute.

The question was taken; and upon a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY) there were—ayes 114, noes 87.

Mr. BAILEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman!

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. BAILEY and Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine tellers.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my colleague, Mr. COOPER of Texas, be appointed, as I am sick.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. COOPER of Texas as one of the tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 92.

So the motion to close debate was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment to the paragraph just read: In line 15, page 4, strike out the words "forty-five" and insert the word "thirty;" so that it will read "$30,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY), there were—ayes 80, noes 107.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. COOPER of Texas and Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine tellers; who reported—ayes 70, noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] may be permitted to print his remarks, so as to save the time.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Maine. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Gunnery exercises: For prizes for excellence in gunnery exercises and target practice——

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I rose to offer an amendment to the last paragraph before the Clerk began reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not see the gentleman from California.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I want to amend that paragraph, too.

Mr. STEELE. The Chairman is not responsible because the gentleman was too slow.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman was not too slow; he was bellowing like a wild bull.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not see any gentleman rise before the Clerk began to read. The Clerk will conclude the reading of the paragraph.

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

diagrams and reports of target practice; for the establishment and maintenance of targets and ranges, for hiring established ranges, and for transporting to and from ranges, $6,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, what I wanted to say, but was prevented by the reading, was that the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] clearly brought himself within the rule to entitle him to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It was not the fault of the gentleman from California that the Chair did not see him, for he was crying in a loud voice like one in the wilderness. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is the last language read? Let us know where we are.

The CHAIRMAN. Line 21, page 4.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk proceed with the reading.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HANDY. For the purpose of offering an amendment to the paragraph last read.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman desires to offer an amendment, will he kindly do it?

Mr. HANDY. With the greatest of pleasure, if the Chair will give me a chance. In line 21, page 4, I move to amend by striking out the word "six" and inserting the word "twelve." On that amendment, when reported, I would like to be heard.

The amendment of Mr. HANDY was read, as follows:

On page —, line 21, strike out "six" and insert in lieu thereof "twelve;" so as to read "$12,000."

Mr SIMPSON of Kansas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware is recognized to speak upon his amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I wish to move an amendment to that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware has the floor.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph, on page 4 of the bill, beginning on line 17 and running to line 21, provides for prizes to be given for excellence in gunnery exercises and in target practice, and for other expenses in connection with target practice. Now, all the ships we build and all the guns we put in them and all the sailors we recruit to go on them center, so far as use and purpose are concerned, in the successful and accurate firing of the gun. This paragraph which looks to rewards for successful target shooting with the great guns of our Navy is therefore of more importance than the small sum involved appears to indicate. My amendment proposes to increase the amount of this appropriation from the pitiful sum of $6,000 to a larger figure—to $12,000. I would increase the sum so as to offer larger prizes to the gunners and stimulate more accurate shooting.

Many gentlemen here may not be aware of the difficulty of accurate shooting with the great guns on our ships of war. In the first place, these guns have to be shot at long range; 10 or 12 miles is the limit of distance that the object to be hit may be from the gun. That object is a moving object, and under present conditions and with the present speed of ships of war, it may be moving very rapidly, possibly over 20 miles an hour. If the object shot at be 10 miles distant and be moving at the rate of 20 miles an hour, it will be, when the shot reaches its objective spot, one-eighth of a mile from the place where it was when the gun was fired.

The difficult problem may be to aim the gun in such a way that when the shot has traversed the 10 miles of intervening space it will strike exactly an eighth of a mile ahead of the spot where the object was when the shot was fired. This very difficult task, Mr. Chairman, has to be accomplished on a movable platform. The gunner on board a ship of war does not have steady ground beneath his feet; he has under him the rolling deck of the vessel. On this kind of a platform, with a huge gun, and with this great range, he must make a most skillful calculation in order to send that shot to its proper place.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, it is more than probable that in any action in which our ships of war may be engaged, there will be very little ammunition spent at these long ranges. The captains of our ships of war will feel more like retaining their ammunition until the hostile object is within, say, 3,000 yards. Most of the discharges will probably be within 1,500 yards. Notwithstanding the great range of the modern guns, the best opinion is that the naval battles of the future will be fought with the ships comparatively close together. But even at 1,500 yards it requires great skill and great aptitude to become a good gunner in shooting these great guns on ships of war. It seems to me, therefore, that an appropriation of only $6,000 for the purpose of offering gunnery prizes is a very meager one.

One great element of strength of the American Navy, if ever we come into conflict with the navy of any other nation, will be found in the superior accuracy of our gunners. Our Navy may be, so far as strength on paper is concerned, about on a par in certain respects with the navy of Spain; but if ever there comes a conflict between one of our ships and a Spanish ship, the superiority of the gunnery of our men will be certain to tell, and will be far more than sufficient to overbalance——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HANDY. I ask consent to continue for thirty minutes longer.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move that all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Delaware be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has made a motion, now in order, to close debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. For what purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. So that the Chair may put to the House my request for unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Delaware be extended for five minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is impossible for me to do that, as the gentleman must understand, in view of the filibustering obstructions which have occupied so much of the time this afternoon.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The delay has been caused by the unadulterated obstinacy of the gentleman from Maine.

The question being taken, on motion of Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine, to close the debate on the paragraph and all amendments, there were—ayes 106, noes 75.

Mr. BAILEY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine and Mr. COOPER of Texas were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 110, noes 72.

So the motion to close debate was agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HANDY, it was rejected.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I move to amend by striking out, in line 21, on page 4, the words "six thousand dollars" and inserting "fifteen thousand dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Before that question is submitted, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes to make a few remarks.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine demands the regular order. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the regular order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did the gentleman from Maine move to close debate upon the pending paragraph and all amendments, or simply upon the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He moved to close all debate on the paragraph and amendments.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas, it was rejected.

Mr. LENTZ. I move to amend by striking out, in line 21, on page 4, the word "six" and inserting the word "sixty," so as to read "$60,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out, in line 21, page 4, the word "six" and insert the word "sixty." As many as favor the amendment will say "aye."

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have a few minutes in which to discuss that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed upon the paragraph and amendments.

Mr. LENTZ. I am asking unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to discuss the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE and Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine objected.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Ocean and lake surveys: For ocean and lake surveys; the publication and care of the results thereof; the purchase of nautical books, charts, and sailing directions, and freight and express charges on same; preparing and engraving on copper plates the surveys of the Mexican coasts, and the publication of a series of charts of the coasts of Central and South America, $14,000.

Mr. HANDY. I desire to reserve a point of order upon that paragraph.

Mr. BAILEY. I was about to make the point of order. The gentleman from Delaware reserves the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware reserves the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. HANDY. In order that the gentleman from Maine can make an explanation.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I will very briefly explain this paragraph with pleasure. This item provides for the continuation of the surveys of the lakes and of the ocean which have been carried on for a number of years by the Hydrographic Bureau, and for the purpose of supplying charts of the Mexican coasts and the publication of a series of charts of the coasts of Central and South America. I move that all debate be closed upon this section and amendments.

Mr. LENTZ. A point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been reserved. Does the gentleman raise a point of order; and what is it?

Mr. BAILEY. It is reserved. I am willing to hear all the explanation anybody desires to make.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I have made all the explanation necessary, Mr. Chairman. I make the motion that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. You can not do that until the point of order is decided.

Mr. BAILEY. That motion is not permissible until the point of order is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should state his point of order. He has not done so.

Mr. BAILEY. It is that this paragraph involves new legislation, and I reserved it supposing that the gentleman from Maine would touch upon that, and inform the House whether this does or does not contain new legislation.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This does not contain any new legislation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Maine having been yielded to by the gentleman from Texas to make an explanation, does that give him the privilege to make a motion to close debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine had the floor in his own right. It was not yielded to him by the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] reserved the point of order, and the gentleman from Maine proceeded to explain the paragraph. Now the gentleman from Texas makes the point of order, as the Chair understands——

Mr. BAILEY. That the present law for surveying the lakes does not provide for the publication of a series of charts of the coast of Central and South America.

Mr. HANDY. And Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman from Maine in reference to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He has called the previous question on himself; how can he?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is that the existing law does not provide for the preparation of plates and surveys of the Mexican coast and the coast of Central and South America.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The only reply necessary is to state that this appropriation is a continuation of appropriations under the law, which have been made year after year, ever since I have had anything to do with appropriation bills. The work has been in progress continuously. No point of order can lie.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, I urge on the attention of the Chair that provisions in former appropriation bills for surveying other places do not give this committee authority to report an appropriation for surveys on the coasts of Mexico and to provide for a series of charts at another place or in another series. For instance, it would not be held by the Chair that these former surveys could authorize a provision in this bill to make a search for the North Pole, and a survey of the northern coast of Greenland, and to make maps of the northern seas and to print charts——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of town lots in South Africa.

Mr. HANDY. Of town lots in South Africa, as suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi. This provision seems to be subject to a point of order, and I am much astonished at the very brief explanation which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has vouchsafed to give. He has stood here objecting all day to debate proceeding upon other subjects than the bill. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] is about to discuss the point of order, I should like to hear his discussion. I should like it to be a little louder, so I can hear it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order. Will all gentlemen please be seated? The Chair is quite as desirous of hearing the gentleman as he is of being heard.

Mr. HANDY. I was not speaking of being heard myself, Mr. Chairman; but I saw the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] in a businesslike manner go and talk privately with the Chair, and I suggested that if he was going to talk to the point of order I should like to hear him. The explanation he has given on the floor has been very brief. Now we have gotten down to the actual facts of the bill, and he makes a few remarks and says that they constitute all the House is entitled to hear, that that is enough, and he moves to shut off all debate. He seems as little willing to discuss the bill with me as he was to discuss the Republican platform with the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN]. What is he willing to discuss to-day, anyhow? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Has the gentleman stated his point of order?

Mr. HANDY. I have not only stated it, but I have argued it to my satisfaction.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And with great ability.

Mr. HANDY. And, I hope, convincingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds the precise provision in regard to the same coasts in the previous bill.

Mr. BAILEY. All this would have been saved if it had been stated in the beginning.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I stated it so the gentleman from Texas ought to have understood it.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Outfits for naval apprentices: For bounties for outfits of 750 naval apprentices, at $45 each, $33,750.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move that all debate on this paragraph be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognise the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who rises to present an amendment, as the Chair understands. The committee will please be in order.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to reserve a point of order.

Mr. OGDEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. OGDEN. I want to raise a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the gentleman from Maine to move that debate be closed on the paragraph, and it has not been adopted. The Clerk immediately went on to read the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. No such motion has been made. The gentleman from Texas was recognized and he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Louisiana was referring to the preceding paragraph.

Mr. OGDEN. The preceding paragraph.

Mr. HENDERSON. We got through with that without the motion.

Mr. OGDEN. There was no vote taken on it.

Mr. BAILEY. The mistake of the Chair was that the Chair supposed that a disposition of the point of order disposed of the whole matter; but that was not true, of course.

Mr. EVANS. If no amendment was offered, it did dispose of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read, unless the gentleman from Texas has something to submit.

Mr. OGDEN. I insist that no vote has been taken on the preceding paragraph.

Mr. EVANS. There was no need to take any vote.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no motion pending on the preceding paragraph.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BAILEY. To reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Against the paragraph ending with line 7?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. BAILEY. And in order that we may save a repetition of what occurred a moment ago on the preceding paragraph, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs if existing law provides for these bounties?

The CHAIRMAN. It does. It is precisely identical with the previous bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He asked the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This is the very provision that has been in appropriation bills for years, under the general law providing for the naval apprentices, and this is a provision similar to that which has been made here year after year, to carry out the law in regard to naval apprentices. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I never yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HANDY. This bill provides bounty for 750 naval apprentices. Can the gentleman succeed in finding out from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] whether the present bill does not increase the number of apprentices or boys in the Navy to 1,000, and therefore whether there should not be more bounty proposed?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, in response to the very courteous reply of the chairman of the committee, I desire to say that I did not know that the laws of the United States had been giving bounties so long; and if I had known it I would heretofore have made the very motion I am going to make now. If it is intended to pay these apprentices for their services, then it ought to specify "for compensation" instead of "for bounty." If it is not a payment for their services, but is a mere gratuity, then I do not believe that the Government ought to be giving it to apprentices in the Navy any more than it ought to be given to laborers on the farms and in the factories of this country.

The Government ought no more to pay a bounty to a man in its employ who draws a salary from its Treasury than it ought to pay a bounty to the farmers and laborers of this country who contribute their sweat to pay the salaries of Government officials. If this is a bounty, I desire to strike it out; and if it is in the nature of compensation, then I desire to change the expression.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I have twice already stated to the committee that it needs no explanation, because members of this body do not need an explanation on a subject of this kind. I have stated that this provision is in accordance with the terms of a very well understood and familiar law for the enlistment of apprentices in the United States Navy. Every bill that I have reported here, every bill that I have known to be reported here, has contained an item similar to this for this express purpose. I will not affront the intelligence of the members of this House by assuming that any of them believe that this appropriation is for an illegal purpose. It is simply to enable the Navy Department to carry out existing law for the enlistment of apprentices of the United States Navy, and I trust that that explanation is satisfactory.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine still has the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Have I the floor for a motion? I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments be closed.

Mr. LENTZ. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I move an amendment to the motion.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And on that motion I desire to be heard.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I move an amendment to the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But it is subject to amendment; and I move to amend it so as to make it read that all debate upon the pending paragraph be closed in twenty minutes.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Thirty.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine moves that all debate upon the paragraph and amendments be closed, and the gentleman from Mississippi moves to amend that so as to read that all debate upon the pending paragraph be closed in twenty minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi and others. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 114.

Mr. BAILEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas, Mr. BAILEY, and the gentleman from Maine, Mr. BOUTELLE, will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 100.

So the amendment to the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the committee rise. I wish to speak to that motion. I wish simply to say——

The CHAIRMAN. This is not a debatable question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9378) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PEARSON. I rise to present a question of personal privilege, and I speak in my own right. It will not take more than a minute. A newspaper published in my State, known as the Raleigh News and Observer, in its issue of yesterday charges me with violating the franking privilege. I desire to state that the charge as applied to me is entirely untrue, and the evidence of it I hold in my hand; and I ask the privilege of inserting in the RECORD the correspondence in question along with the publications which prompted this correspondence.

Here are the facts: My clerk mailed twenty letters, all of the same form, tenor, and effect. Six of them were addressed to members either of this body or of the Senate. They were mailed in the Capitol, put in the boxes of Members and Senators, and probably delivered in the Capitol. The other letters, in identical words, were sent to North Carolina, and, as I understand, were stamped. I knew nothing of the facts, except as given me by this clerk, nor do I know whether his construction of the law is correct. Members around me differ on this point, and it being a question of doubt and of propriety, I resolved it in favor of the Government immediately upon hearing of the matter and before any complaint was made, except my criticism of the clerk's action.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

HOUSE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., March 21.

DEAR SIR: I am informed that at a conference of Populists, held at Raleigh on the 16th instant, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the spirit of the recommendatory address by the national chairman of the People's Party and the silver Republican party invoking the union of all forces favoring reform of the financial system is cordially indorsed, since such reform was the inspiration of the People's Party, and is now the greatest purpose."

In view of the successful cooperation of the Republicans and Populists of North Carolina, in 1894 and 1896, I take the liberty of asking if you indorse this resolution, and if, in the approaching Congressional election, you favor cooperation or fusion with the Democratic party.

I trust that you will find it convenient to reply at an early date.

Very respectfully,

RICHMOND PEARSON.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1898.

DEAR SIR: As private secretary to Representative PEARSON, I mailed on the 21st instant six letters which, though relating to public matters, would not strictly be included in the term of "official business." It was simply an inadvertence on my part, and I am directed to inclose six 2 cent stamps which should have been used on the letters except for this mistake.

Very respectfully,

GEO. H. MILLS.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1898.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23d instant, in which you state that as private secretary to Representative PEARSON you inadvertently mailed six letters which, though relating to public matters, would not strictly be included in the term "official business," and, as directed, you therefore inclose six 2-cent postage stamps which should have been used on the letters except for this mistake.

The sum of 12 cents has been deposited in the Treasury in your name on account of Conscience, and duplicate of certificate of deposit No. 24673, issued this day by the Treasurer of the United States for the amount, is herewith inclosed.

Respectfully, yours,

W. B. HOWELL,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. GEORGE H. MILLS (care Hon. R. PEARSON),
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn—

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 1803. An act for the relief of Joseph P. Patton; and

H. R. 5865. An act to authorize the Monroe Railway and Construction Company to construct a bridge across Red River at or near Grand Ecore, La.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4037. An act to correct the military record of James Denny—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 4124. An act for the protection of song birds—to the Committee on Agriculture.

S. 2673. An act for the relief of William A. Cowles—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 3871. An act to authorize the Montgomery-Elmore Bridge and Improvement Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Alabama River near the city of Montgomery, Ala.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 4206. An act extending the time for the construction of a wagon and motor bridge across the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., as provided by act approved June 3, 1896—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 4137. An act amending section 4492 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to barges—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 1354. An act granting a pension to Burton Packard—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1901. An act to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 244. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Joplin, in the State of Missouri—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. STRAIT was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive and other communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the chairman of the Light-House Board submitting an estimate of deficiency—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the commissioners of the Gettysburg National Military Park submitting a draft of a bill for protecting ornamental and other trees on Government reservations, etc.—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Surgeon-General of the Army recommending an increase in the number of hospital stewards—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. TONGUE: Petitions of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Friends' Church of Chehalem, Methodist Episcopal churches of Mount Tabor and Montavilla, Oreg.; Christian Church, Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, Baptist Young People's Union, and Epworth League, of Amity, and Oregon State Normal School, all of the State of Oregon, asking for the passage of a bill to forbid the sale of intoxicating beverages in all Government buildings—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. VINCENT: Petition of College Hill Union, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Manhattan, Kans., for the passage of a bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol building and grounds—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, petitions of the College Hill Union, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Manhattan, Kans., for the passage of bills to protect State anti-cigarette laws, to raise the age of protection for girls to 18 years, and to forbid interstate transmission of lottery messages by telegraph, etc.—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WANGER: Resolution of Defiance Lodge, No. 335, Knights of Pythias, of Newtown, Bucks County, Pa., in support of House bill No. 6468, granting land at Hot Springs, Ark., for the purpose of erecting and maintaining a sanitarium thereon—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Churchville, Bucks County, Pa., asking for the passage of a bill to raise the age of protection for girls to 18 years in the District of Columbia, to protect State anti-cigarette laws, and to forbid the transmission of lottery messages by telegraph—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Churchville, Pa., in favor of the passage of a bill to prohibit the sale of liquors in Government buildings—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. WHITE of North Carolina: Resolutions adopted by colored citizens of Macon, Ga., in behalf of the Baker family of South Carolina—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. YOUNG of Pennsylvania: Petition of Nonpareil Lodge, No. 20, Knights of Pythias, of Philadelphia, Pa., indorsing House bill No. 6468, praying for a lease of public land from the Government for the establishment of a national Pythian sanitarium—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, petition of the Travelers' Protective Association of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the passage of the anti-scalping bill—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of the National Association of Manufacturers, asking for the passage of Senate bill No. 753, for the establishment of an international bank—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, letter of C. H. Duell, Commissioner of Patents, in relation to supplying the Official Gazette to the Central Manual Training School, at Philadelphia, Pa.—to the Committee on the Library.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 26, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to correct the RECORD. Yesterday afternoon, immediately before the adjournment of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] asked unanimous consent to insert some matter in the RECORD. That matter appears this morning, and it is almost wholly of a political character, and does not, as I conceive, affect the question of personal privilege that he raised.

Now, in view of the action of the House yesterday with reference to the speech of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN], I shall feel constrained to move to strike from the RECORD that part of the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina which gives a quotation from the New York Tribune. But before I do that I desire to repeat what I said yesterday, that there is no danger in allowing the utmost latitude of debate, and I shall not raise any question about the matter printed by the gentleman from North Carolina if the gentleman from Montana can be permitted to insert what he desires to say in the RECORD. The leave granted to the gentleman from North Carolina clearly did not embrace the matter which he has printed.

The SPEAKER. If that is the case, it ought not to be in the RECORD.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. PEARSON. What part of the correspondence does the gentleman object to? I asked and received permission by the unanimous consent of the House to print the correspondence and print the publications which gave rise to the correspondence; and the two articles taken from the two papers, the New York Tribune and the Raleigh News and Observer, both bear upon the same question, and that is the attitude of the national parties.

Mr. BAILEY. There was absolutely no intimation that there was any political matter in it. In fact, it was asked by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], although I do not discover that the RECORD recites it——

Mr. PEARSON. If the gentleman will allow me, no one asked me that question.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asked the gentleman from North Carolina if there was anything political in it. The gentleman from North Carolina may not have heard it, but the gentleman from Mississippi certainly asked the question.

Mr. PEARSON. I certainly did not hear it.

Mr. BAILEY. I am willing to believe that.

Mr. PEARSON. There were a good many things said yesterday that were not heard——

Mr. BAILEY. And some things printed that ought not to have been printed.

Mr. PEARSON (continuing). I did not even hear the grunt of the gentleman from Maine. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. That was the gentleman's own fault, because it was so distinct that almost anybody could have heard it. [Laughter.]

Now, I desire, Mr. Speaker, to know if the gentleman from North Carolina proposes to resist the request——

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me? The only objectionable feature in this matter is a quotation taken from the paper supposed to be controlled by William Jennings Bryan. Does not the gentleman indorse that?

Mr. BAILEY. I would indorse anything William Jennings Bryan would say on a public question at this time [applause], but, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina had been accused of abusing the franking privilege, and he comes in here and prints matter that now brings the very thing complained of under the franking privilege of the House. I do not accuse the gentleman of having that purpose in view, but as a matter of fact the accusation of his abuse of the franking privilege can no longer be made, because the very matter that he is charged with improperly franking before he has now made frankable under the leave of the House, and I think it a clear abuse of the leave to print.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if I understood the gentleman from North Carolina last evening, he said he had sent certain matter through the mail to representatives in Congress of both Houses under his frank; that he did not know himself whether that was an abuse of the franking privilege or not, and that he desired to print the matter that he had franked, with some other matter which he held in his hand; that the whole of it might go in, and the House could see whether there was any abuse of the franking privilege or not, and he was willing to stand by it. To that the House gave unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from North Carolina admitted that he had decided it was not frankable. He said:

> I knew nothing of the facts, except as given me by this clerk, nor do I know whether his construction of the law is correct. Members around me differ on this point, and it being a question of doubt and of propriety, I resolved it in favor of the Government immediately upon hearing of the matter and before any complaint was made.

So he himself resolved that it was not frankable, but he proceeds at once to make it frankable. Now, I desire to say that since there is some question about it, we might as well compare the RECORD with the stenographer's notes, and the stenographer's notes will throw some light upon the matter.

The SPEAKER. The request made by the gentleman from North Carolina was: "I ask the privilege of inserting in the RECORD the correspondence in question along with the publications which prompted this correspondence." The Chair put the question, "Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none."

Mr. BAILEY. And the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], very distinctly heard on this side of the floor, inquired whether there was any political matter in it; and our understanding was that there was not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question before the House? Under what rule of order is this debate proceeding?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] desires to correct the RECORD, and he gave notice that he would move to correct it. This is a preliminary discussion on that point—somewhat informal, but the Chair thinks the RECORD ought to be correct.

Mr. BAILEY. In order to make this proposition entirely formal, I move to strike out from the RECORD all on page 3584, after the word——

Mr. PEARSON. We can not hear what the gentleman is saying. It is important to me at least that I should hear.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Clerk to read my motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Strike out from the RECORD all on page 3584 after the words "correspondence and publications referred to are as follows," and all on page 3585 preceding the words "House Committee on Foreign Affairs."

Mr. HOPKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS. This matter, as I understand, was put in the RECORD by unanimous consent. Can a part of the House strike it out upon motion after it has been put in by unanimous consent?

Mr. BAILEY. If improperly inserted, certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. That does not appear.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the fact of the matter having been put in the RECORD by unanimous consent gives it no more force than if it had been done by a majority.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, having had large experience in regard to striking matter from the RECORD

[laughter], as the older members of the House are aware, I move you that the whole subject be referred to the Committee on Printing——

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has not the floor for the purpose of making that motion.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will ask to be recognized to make that motion when the gentleman yields the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I take it that the gentleman can not obtain the floor upon a parliamentary inquiry, and then, having it for that purpose, proceed to make a motion.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I did not get the floor upon a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman distinctly stated that he rose to a parliamentary inquiry at the same time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] rose.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I sought the floor in my own right.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Massachusetts both rose for the same purpose, and so stated to the Chair. But that is immaterial. The gentleman could not get the floor at all if not for a parliamentary inquiry, because I was occupying the floor and had not yielded it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, reserving what time may be left after the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] concludes, I yield him such time as he may desire to discuss this question.

Mr. HANDY rose.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, I think I can demonstrate to the House—and I ask the attention of members—that this newspaper article which appears in the RECORD under the auspices of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] appears there without the authority of the House. The request of the gentleman for unanimous consent, as printed in the RECORD (which, by the way, is not the request the gentleman submitted to the House), reads as follows:

> I ask the privilege of inserting in the RECORD the correspondence in question, along with the publications which prompted this correspondence.

Certainly this newspaper article of a partisan character in the New York Tribune is not a part of the correspondence.

Now I shall show beyond all dispute that it can not be a publication which prompted that correspondence. In inserting it in the RECORD as a publication which prompted the correspondence, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] violated the privilege which was given him on the floor. If gentlemen of the House will refer to the first letter of that correspondence as it appears in the RECORD, they will find it is dated March 21. I have in my hand a copy of the New York Tribune containing the article, which appears as if it prompted the gentleman's letter of March 21; and that article, Mr. Speaker, was published on March 22, the day after he had written the letter.

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman will allow me to say——

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. This is a matter which ought to be determined with reference to the propriety of the RECORD; and the Chair hopes that all the facts will be brought before the House. Does the gentleman from Delaware yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HANDY. With the greatest pleasure in the world, for a question or for a brief explanation.

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman from Delaware knows me well enough to know that I would not abuse the privilege of this House or the privileges that belong to a member by reason of the law. It was for that very reason that I felt constrained to deny the charge made in this newspaper publication in Raleigh. It was considered to be too trivial for the broad-minded men in this House, but it was not too trivial for certain narrow-minded men in that State. And it was addressed to them.

Now, as to the question of propriety in this matter, I have asked the gentleman from Ohio, who has one opinion, and I have asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has another opinion, as to the matter. It is really a question of propriety which can not be settled unless the whole correspondence goes in.

Mr. HANDY. It is not to any correspondence that I object. It is to the publication of——

Mr. PEARSON rose.

Mr. HANDY. The gentleman will pardon me. It is to the publication of a partisan newspaper article published after the correspondence had been written, an article that had nothing to do with the correspondence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand the stenographer's notes of the actual request that was submitted for unanimous consent. Those notes read as follows:

> Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker——
> Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

The House may remember that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] was at that time assuming the privilege of recognizing gentlemen on the floor [laughter], so he threw that remark in. Mr. PEARSON continued:

> I rise to present a question of personal privilege. It will not take more than a minute. A partisan newspaper published in my State, known as the Raleigh News and Observer, in its issue of yesterday charges me with violating the franking privilege. I desire to say that the charge is entirely untrue, and the evidence of it I hold in my hand, which I shall ask the privilege of inserting in the RECORD. It is this question simply:
> My clerk mailed twenty letters of the same form, effect, and tenor. Six of them were addressed to members either of this body or the Senate. He thought that they did not need stamps, and did not put them on. The other letters of the same kind which he sent to the State were stamped. I do not know myself how the matter is, or how the law is, or should be, and I desire to put the correspondence, the facts, the explanation of the letter in the RECORD.
> The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

To that the House of Representatives gave its unanimous consent, and why should we not give consent to such a request? When the gentleman from North Carolina has been accused of violating his franking privilege, and tells this House that he holds in his hands the evidence to refute that charge, and asks this House that he may put in the RECORD the correspondence, the facts, and the explanation of the letters, who would object?

The next morning, Mr. Speaker, we find in the RECORD three letters, one of which appears to be the letter which was franked, another of which appears to be the letter where his secretary contributed 12 cents to the conscience fund of the United States, and the third of which appears to be the Treasury's formal acknowledgment of the receipt of 12 cents to the conscience fund. That much is an explanation; that much is a refutation of the facts. But in addition to those letters, bearing not in the least upon the gentleman's abuse of the franking privilege, bearing not in the least upon the correspondence, there appears more than a column of a partisan article taken from the New York Tribune, printed a day after he wrote the letters and after his clerk had mailed them under the franking privilege. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman ought to be very careful about the facts. He will not state that the letter which I wrote was dated before this newspaper article.

Mr. HANDY. I will.

Mr. PEARSON. That is the letter of this clerk which explains his action.

Mr. HANDY. It is not. It is the letter of RICHMOND PEARSON. It is as follows:

> HOUSE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
> Washington, D. C., March 21.
> DEAR SIR: I am informed that at a conference of Populists, held at Raleigh on the 16th instant, the following resolution was adopted:
> "Resolved, That the spirit of the recommendatory address by the national chairman of the People's Party and the Silver Republican party, invoking the union of all forces favoring reform of the financial system, is cordially indorsed, since such reform was the inspiration of the People's Party, and is now the greatest purpose."
> In view of the successful cooperation of the Republicans and Populists of North Carolina in 1894 and 1896, I take the liberty of asking if you indorse this resolution, and if, in the approaching Congressional election, you favor cooperation or fusion with the Democratic party?
> I trust that you will find it convenient to reply at an early date.
>
> Very respectfully,
> RICHMOND PEARSON.

On March 22, in the New York Tribune, appeared this article, while the letter in question is dated on March 21. Here is the article, which was telegraphed from Washington on March 21. It appeared on March 22, and under no construction of the unanimous consent granted to the gentleman could that article appear in the RECORD.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all day yesterday, a Democrat, or rather a silver Republican, wanted to put in the RECORD some partisan matter, and the House would not let him do it; but late in the afternoon the gentleman from North Carolina, sensitive under the charge that he had been accused of using the franking privilege wrongfully, arose to a question of personal privilege and laid the foundation for franking an article which had appeared in the New York Tribune. That is the only connection this article can possibly have with his franking privilege.

He laid the foundation then in order that he might frank that article in his district in the future. That was never consented to by the House. If we are going to stand here and maintain the integrity of unanimous consent, gentlemen can not afford to get unanimous consent to print one thing in the RECORD and then the next day have the RECORD show another thing, to which the House did not consent and would not have been willing to consent. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] sat there, and he raised that question. He said, "Is there anything political in it?"

Mr. PEARSON. I did not hear that.

Mr. HANDY. The gentleman from North Carolina did not hear it. I will believe him. I have known him personally. I have liked the gentleman from North Carolina, and I am not animated here by a personal spirit of unfriendliness. He knows, and every gentleman who knows our relations knows, that our relations have been extremely friendly, and I still entertain them; but I could not sit here, sir, and read with patience the RECORD this morning, where my political friend from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] was shut out and denied the privilege of franking to his own people his own speech, while the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON], by what looks to me like a subterfuge, obtained the consent to frank to his people a partisan article from the New York Tribune.

The article which the gentleman put in the RECORD related to fusion. He is interested in fusion. He represents a fusion of Populists and Republicans. The movement to make Populists and Democrats fuse hurt his political feelings most tremendously. [Laughter.] He wanted something that would persuade the Populists of North Carolina that their true alliance was with the Republicans, and he went to the New York Tribune and got this article and put it in this RECORD, Mr. Speaker, without the consent of the House. I do not see how this House can possibly, in the face of the facts, refuse to pass the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to strike it out.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is wholly at variance with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BAILEY. I am entitled to the floor; but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEELE. I think the gentleman is entitled to the floor in his own right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a matter which concerns us all, and it ought to be settled upon principles that will be satisfactory to every member of the House; and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] having the floor, yields it to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. For the purpose of any statement that he desires to make.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the motion be read?

Mr. PEARSON. Perhaps it would be better for me to take the floor in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] asks that the motion be submitted.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Massachusetts can not take me off the floor to make that request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to know what the motion is.

Mr. BAILEY. To know what the motion is? I thought when the Chair used the word "submit" that he meant to put the motion to the House.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask for the reading of the motion in my time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the motion.

Mr. BROWN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to ask if the gentleman from North Carolina is not entitled to the floor in his own right and not in the time of the gentleman from Texas?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina can speak in his own right when the time comes, but he has had time yielded to him by the gentleman in charge of the motion.

Mr. STEELE. And he hurts his cause by it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move to strike out from the RECORD all on page 3584, after the words "the correspondence and publications referred to are as follows," and all on page 3585 preceding the words "House Committee on Foreign Affairs."

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not ask that the RECORD, as edited by the gentleman from North Carolina, be corrected further than to make it conform to the motion which I have made, because as the RECORD appears there might be some ground for the contention which gentlemen on that side were about to make that the permission the House had granted to the gentleman from North Carolina authorized the printing of that article from the New York Tribune. I do not think, even under the statement as it appears in the RECORD, it being so wholly disconnected with the matter which precedes and which succeeds it, that it could have been by any fair intendment included in the request for unanimous consent.

The gentleman from North Carolina himself will see that it would become necessary at least to correct the RECORD so that by no kind of construction would we be asking the House to strike out of the RECORD something which we had consented to go into it. If the gentleman from North Carolina is willing that this motion prevail without resistance, then I shall not ask to correct the RECORD any further, except to strike out the words "publications which led to it."

Mr. Speaker, it has always impressed me as a small proceeding, this effort to correct the RECORD. The country will get at the truth of any matter, where the truth deeply concerns it. My judgment is that the country knows very little and cares less about what the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains, as a rule, and I have frequently felt that it was making much ado about nothing. I was only constrained to take the action I have because of the evident intention on the part of the other side of the House not only to hold this side to the rules most rigidly as to what we speak, but to insist that what was spoken shall be printed exactly as it was spoken.

On a previous day of the session a long time was wasted in the House over the question whether the word "most" should be inserted where a member had edited his manuscript to make it read "many," and that, too, in the face of the fact that the gentleman not once, but repeatedly, declared that he believed he had used the word "many," and was certain that he intended to use it.

Yet all the power of that side was summoned, a roll call was forced, and by the verdict—I should should say by the edict of the majority, for that is the better word—a word different from the one which a gentleman on this side of the Chamber protested that he had used was incorporated in the RECORD.

Even that might not excuse us. Even that might not have provoked us to resort to this; but yesterday when a gentleman occupying a seat on this side of the Chamber, or, at least, who is in political sympathy with this side of the Chamber, attempted to deliver a speech he was called to order, and the strictest rules were invoked against him, and notwithstanding the fact we stood here and cited from the RECORD a parallel instance where that very gentleman, under similar circumstances, had been permitted by the Republican majority in the Fifty-fourth Congress to proceed, his right yesterday was not only abridged but denied.

Then, after we had consumed some two hours, and we desired to consume no more, I asked unanimous consent that the gentleman from Montana should be permitted to print his remarks. Promptly an objection came from that side of the House. He was not only silenced, but he was denied a permission seldom refused to anyone in this House. In less than an hour after the gentleman from Montana had been denied permission to print what he desired to say the gentleman from North Carolina rose and preferred a similar request. While the objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana was still ringing in our ears, we accorded to the gentleman from North Carolina a permission which had been denied the gentleman from Montana an hour before.

I simply recite these facts in order that the House and country may understand our fairness toward you and the unfairness with which you return our liberality. Having been denied a reasonable request on this side, and this side having granted what we supposed was a reasonable request upon that side, and it being demonstrated in the morning's RECORD that our permission has been grossly abused, we saw no other course open to us but to move a correction of the RECORD.

I am sure that the gentleman from North Carolina himself, upon reflection, will admit not only the propriety, but the justice of my motion, because, however honest he may have been, he was honestly mistaken, for the RECORD shows the letter about which the question arose was dated the 21st of March, and the article which he prints as having led up to the correspondence was printed in a paper dated a day after his letter was written. Certainly the gentleman from North Carolina will not attempt to answer our demand for the correction of the RECORD. Does the gentleman desire to interrupt me?

Mr. PEARSON. "The gentleman from North Carolina" is going to second the motion.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, then, I desire to acknowledge that the gentleman from North Carolina is infinitely fairer than his associates on that side of the Chamber. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PEARSON. I desire to say something in my own behalf and in my own time.

Mr. BELL. You did not draw the distinction between the actual record and the printed RECORD.

Mr. BAILEY. I said I was going to waive that, and leave that to the gentleman himself, and only shall insist from the words "publications leading up to that" be stricken out.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, there are two publications. The publication which inspired my letter of inquiry was dated, I think, March 17. The Tribune article explains it.

Mr. BAILEY. It is understood, Mr. Speaker, that I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. STEELE. I do not think it is understood at all. The gentleman has yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman so states.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, there are certain questions of fact, certain questions of propriety, and certain questions of delicacy of conduct here which require me to speak, and I trust that I can speak somewhat at leisure. I know the gentleman from Maine who has charge of the appropriation bill desires to go on with it; but, Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely essential that I shall recite certain facts.

I desire to state that there are two publications—one of them taken from the Raleigh News and Observer, as much of it as appears in the form of this letter, and the other from the New York Tribune, which I had in the envelope at the same time, and both of which I assure the gentleman from Texas would have been read yesterday if he had not exhausted the patience of the House before I got the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. That is a fair return for my acknowledging your fairness.

Mr. PEARSON. The gentleman will not outdo me in fairness, in justice, or in courtesy. He knows that he himself was so fatigued that he could not get up and shake hands with the gentleman from Maine and count the gentlemen pass between them in the endless whirligig which took place yesterday.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from North Carolina knows that I stated at the time that I was suffering with a headache and had a high fever, as I have at this minute.

Mr. PEARSON. That is what I said.

Mr. BAILEY. You said that I "was so fatigued." I was sick, and the gentleman knew it, as I am this morning.

Mr. PEARSON. If the gentleman prefers the word "sick" to "fatigued," very well. My point is the same. When I first saw this, I asked the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] to let me get up and speak. He said that he thought it would hardly be proper, but when the committee rose and the House resumed its sessions, then I could be recognized in my own right on a question of personal privilege.

Now, the publication dated "March 21, House of Representatives," to which my name is signed, appears in the Raleigh News and Observer, that is to say, the conference, I think, was held March 16—I am not quite sure about it; it may have been the 17th. I saw that article, and, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I realized at once that at least five seats in the House of Representatives now occupied by members from North Carolina depended upon the attitude which they would assume with reference to that matter which took place in the city of Raleigh at a conference of Populists, I think on the 16th of this month. I saw it on the 17th; and I have written letters to each one of the gentlemen, and it becomes essential for me to state facts which I did not know at the time. My clerk brought the letters into the Capitol, as he tells me, and they were distributed through the post-office here. He did not put stamps on them because he understood that was not the practice. He related the facts to me and I was at least doubtful about it, and so I resolved the doubt and made him take the pitiful 12 cents to the Treasury and get a formal receipt for it.

I would rather be criticised for doing a trivial act of that sort than to have the slightest suspicion upon my good faith. I will state to those gentlemen, who know the value of a good name in the country they represent, that there is nothing so trivial but that it may be magnified by political opponents.

Mr. HANDY. Let me say to the gentleman from North Carolina that we do not criticise him in the least in regard to the franking of these letters. Our criticism is made exclusively and solely on the publication in the RECORD this morning of the New York Tribune article.

Mr. PEARSON. I do not want to detain the House long, but I want the House to understand my character and motives. I had in this envelope the quotations of the New York Tribune, which bear upon the same question which I had proposed to my Populist colleagues—that is to say, "the Populists are receiving the fusion proposition with coldness, and in many sections with absolute disfavor."

I am not going to read the whole article, but I could get it in here now, because I am going to say, along with the gentleman from Texas, that it being a matter to which he would have objected, although I had it in my hand at the time and intended to print it, I will not abuse his courtesy, nor will I abuse his kindness in yielding that unanimous consent. I indorse his proposition and will vote for his motion.

I desire, however, Mr. Speaker, to say this: I feel rather keenly the fact that a courteous question proposed by a colleague to his colleagues in this House bearing upon their attitude on this question, "Do you propose in the coming election to cooperate or fuse with the Democratic party?" knowing as they know here that every man of them sits here by reason of Republican votes, should be answered by "You have abused the franking privilege; and I will take the privilege of assuring my friends from Texas and Delaware that I would rather have as my colleague a Democratic gentleman than——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman must confine himself to the question.

Mr. PEARSON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will wind up with this assertion——

Mr. STROWD of North Carolina. Finish the statement.

Mr. FOWLER of North Carolina. Finish the statement like a man.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman does, the Chair wants it understood that it is done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHUFORD. Let the gentleman finish his statement. Let him say who the other party is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is only performing his duty in recalling the gentleman from North Carolina to the question under discussion.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me a suggestion?

Mr. PEARSON. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand the gentleman proposes to ask unanimous consent to withdraw the article from the RECORD?

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I will close with the statement that I was in favor, and I am now in favor, of allowing the request of the gentleman from Montana. I voted with my party, but I want to be fair. I know the privilege has been abused of putting matters in the RECORD, and I put this there simply because it related to the same question which was being agitated in North Carolina and which was the motive of my letter of inquiry to my colleagues. I see that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is correct in the matter, and I willingly and cheerfully consent to the adoption of his motion.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why not ask unanimous consent to withdraw it?

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] takes his seat I would like to ask him a question. The gentleman made a statement that he would rather sit with a Democratic gentleman as a colleague than—— Now, I would like to ask him what he was going to call a Populist? [Laughter.] He did not finish his statement.

Mr. PEARSON. What I was about to say was that I would rather sit with a Democratic gentleman—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I want to hear the gentleman's reply to my question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. PEARSON. That I would rather sit with a Democratic gentleman anywhere than with a Populist traitor anywhere. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution, it was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a still further correction which I think ought to be made. Of course the words "publication which prompted this correspondence" should be stricken out and in lieu thereof it should read, "I desire to put the correspondence or facts or explanations in the RECORD."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the correction will be made in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas.

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. The pending paragraph was the following:

Outfits for naval apprentices: For bounties for outfits of 750 naval apprentices, at $45 each, $33,750.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the motion to close debate on the paragraph just read.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "bounties for;" so that the paragraph will read:

For outfits of 750 naval apprentices, etc.

The word "bounties" is not appropriate and should be stricken out.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Arming and equipping Naval Militia: For arms, accouterments, signal outfits, boats and their equipments, and the printing of the necessary books of instruction for the Naval Militia of the various States, and to enable it to collect and tabulate information relative to the defense of the coast, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, $60,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "accouterments," in line 16, page 9, the word "clothing."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is the reason for this proposition?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will explain it. The object of the amendment is to provide the Naval Militia with clothing in addition to the other articles provided for them in this bill. It seems to be a very curious fact that such a provision as I now propose has never before been inserted in the law. There can be no question that the Naval Militia, especially at the present time, occupy a most important position in this country, yet we find they are not provided with this essential part of their equipment.

Gentlemen are no doubt aware that in the provision for the National Guards, the appropriation being $400,000, clothing is provided for that body of troops, and there seems to be no reason why similar provision should not be made for the Naval Militia. In fact, Mr. Chairman, there are much stronger reasons for providing the Naval Militia with clothing than for providing the National Guards with clothing. The Naval Militia are all of them at places which, from the very nature of the case, are exposed to attack. They are certain to be called into service before the National Guards are; and it is a fact that the Naval Militia of three States have now been called upon for temporary service. The service of the Naval Militia is also much more onerous than that of the National Guards.

If anyone supposes that the duties which the Naval Militia are called upon to perform are of a holiday character, he is very much mistaken. The work imposed upon them, when they are called out for practice, is very onerous indeed. It differs from the National Guard in this respect, that while the National Guard are under their own officers, the Naval Militia in all their exercise, practice, and drill are under the officers of the Navy. I speak from personal knowledge when I say that the duties the Naval Militia have been called upon to perform in times of peace are very difficult and arduous indeed.

I hope the House will see the reasonableness of adopting this amendment, which has, as I understand, the indorsement of the Department. Indeed, I was informed that the provision had been inserted in the bill. I hope that this very proper addition to the outfit of the Naval Militia will be agreed to.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, up to this time the Government of the United States has never assumed to clothe the Naval Militia. This militia is composed of State organizations with certain ramified relations to the Government of the United States. The relations of the Navy Department to these organizations up to this time have found expression in an annual appropriation of $50,000 for furnishing the organization with certain articles of equipment such as are named in this paragraph—arms, accouterments, signal outfits, boats, and such other things as the Navy Department is better qualified to furnish than any other Department.

To divert a portion of this money for the purpose of clothing the Naval Militia would be to absorb the whole appropriation and cause a demand for more money before the real object of the appropriation could be complied with. It has never been contemplated to make any such provision as this; and I do not think it is contemplated now to enlarge in this way the scope of this appropriation. I think it would be unadvisable certainly, with the amount now appropriated, which is $10,000 more than ever before. We have this year placed the appropriation at the exact figure requested of the committee by a delegation representing the chief officers of the Naval Militia throughout the country. It will be obvious, of course, to members that to divert any portion of this $10,000 for the purpose of providing clothing for this militia would be practically to defeat the object of the appropriation itself. There has been no suggestion before our committee for anything of the kind from anybody connected with the Naval Militia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] to insert in line 16, page 9, after the word "accouterments," the word "clothing."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOOTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21, page 9, after the word "prescribed," strike out the word "sixty" and insert "one hundred;" so that it will read, "$100,000."

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Chairman, in support of that amendment, I wish to state that I went to the Department yesterday and Mr. Roosevelt said that this amount of money was too small, when it is contemplated that more arms, especially more small arms, will soon be needed for the arming of the reserve. In accordance with these ideas of the Department, Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment making the amount $100,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to repeat and impress upon the members of the House what I stated before, that we have appropriated annually $50,000 to these purposes, and this year, at the request of representative officers of the Naval Militia, we have increased the appropriation by $10,000, being the entire amount which they desired; and I have had no intimation or suggestion from any source, either from the Department or from the officers of the Naval Militia, that they desired any addition to that.

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state in reference to that that I had an intimation yesterday from the Navy Department in this very regard, and I think the members of this House are fully able to judge as to the necessity of providing small arms in the way of arming these new corps that will soon have to be sent out.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak to this amendment.

I was heartily in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT], and it was my understanding with the gentleman from South Carolina, and I had supposed with the Chair, that the amendment which I had prepared, which is the same as the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FOOTE], should be submitted, and that the two might be argued together, and that the vote might be taken on them consecutively after they both had been argued.

I am heartily in favor of this amendment increasing the appropriation from sixty thousand to one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. Chairman, the events that are so rapidly transpiring before us have shown that a strong Navy is necessary to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare of our own people.

The unusual character of these events and the suddenness of their occurrence have also brought home to us a realizing consciousness of the position which we now occupy in the great family of nations, together with the privileges and prerogatives as well as the duties and obligations which that position imposes upon us. For more than a century we have been pursuing our course as a nation, free from all foreign entanglements and alliances, engaging in foreign wars only long enough to bring them to a speedy and victorious conclusion, and to demonstrate to the nations of the world the desirability of remaining at peace with the United States. And now, in the progress of events, we have reached that position where we are entitled to assume, on the North American Continent, the same position that belongs to the great powers of Europe in reference to the affairs of Europe, the contiguous portions of Asia and Africa, and the adjacent islands.

It means, Mr. Chairman, that the time has come in the course of events when we as a nation are called upon to determine the most delicate problem that can ever be brought before us as a nation, namely, the problem of intervention in the affairs of a friendly power. Mr. Chairman, it is admitted by all that the six great powers of Europe have assumed and have the right to interfere to prevent, among the smaller nations of Europe or the adjacent portions of Asia and Africa, long-continued, cruel, and barbarous war. This right of intervention has been permitted there, not only with the consent of all the civilized world, for maintaining the peace of Europe and the balance of power, but also——

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Does the Chair hold that the remarks of the gentleman are pertinent to the amendment offered by him?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the remarks are pertinent to the bill. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I understood the Chair yesterday to hold that debate upon other matters than the pending amendment could only be made in general debate and not under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky are not in order.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. They are as much in order as the other.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I hope to be able to show the gentleman the orderly sequence of my remarks as applying to this very amendment. I say it has also been recognized by the world that these six great powers of Europe have the right to intervene, and they have repeatedly intervened, with the approval of the civilized world, to prevent long-continued, revolting, and atrocious cruelties that were repugnant to the sense of the civilized and enlightened world. I know that intervention between two foreign powers is one thing, and I know that intervention in the internal affairs of one nation is a much more delicate problem to consider and to answer aright.

I know that, as in the case of individuals, one might readily interfere in the quarrel or altercation of friends on the public highway, and I know that it would be an altogether different thing to invade the sanctity of a man's home and there interfere in his domestic affairs. But if one knew that within a man's castle he was strangling his own child, one would break through all restraints and in the cause of humanity rescue the innocent. [Applause.]

I say, Mr. Chairman, that in the course of events, as the greatest and most enlightened power on the North American Continent, the question is now brought before us of our intervention in the affairs of Spain in the management of her subjects in Cuba. And what I want to say is this, that just as we recognize the right of the six great powers of Europe to intervene to prevent cruelties and atrocities that are repugnant to the enlightened sense of the world, so on the North American Continent it is not only the prerogative, but the duty of the United States to intervene under similar circumstances. [Applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the time is at hand when we must intervene in Cuba.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I should like to know what section this speech refers to?

The CHAIRMAN. It refers to the section covered by lines 15 to 21, inclusive, on page 9.

Mr. MADDOX. I do not want to object, but I want to inquire where the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] is?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I am trying to fill his place as well as I can. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair trusts the gentleman will confine himself to a discussion of this section, and not of the entire bill.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I will endeavor to confine myself entirely to an argument for the increase of the Naval Militia appropriation to the extent of $100,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MADDOX. I am not objecting. I just wanted to know where the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] was.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. HAY. I object.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. VINCENT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to make his speech in his own way.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection has been made to the extension of his time. The gentleman moves to strike out the last word, and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the time has come when we, as representatives of the people, conscious of the position which we as a nation occupy, sensible not only of our privileges and prerogatives, but of our rights and duties, should intervene in the relations of Spain to Cuba——

Mr. LOUD. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOUD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that this discussion is no more pertinent to the section that we are now on than the discussion of the silver question which was proposed yesterday was, and I hope our side of the House at least——

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I think that the gentleman from California will see that my motion to increase this appropriation for the Naval Militia is properly under discussion in my remarks.

Mr. LOUD. I have been waiting for five minutes and listening patiently for the gentleman to come to the section, and he has been discussing intervention in Cuba.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. That is because it is our duty to intervene in Cuba, and that will demand at once the service of the Naval Militia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must admit that he has been so interrupted that he has not been able to follow the gentleman's argument closely at all.

Mr. LOUD. I hope our side of the House, Mr. Chairman, will not provoke——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will simply say to the gentleman that it is the intention of the Chair to hold all gentlemen to discussion of the section under consideration, and trusts the gentleman from Illinois will proceed with that idea in view.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I would like, in response to the gentleman from California, to state to the House——

Mr. LOUD. I do not want to enter on the course we had yesterday. Such discussion as this on our side is going to lead to discussion on the other side, which has as much right as we have.

Mr. LENTZ. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LENTZ. When the gentleman from Illinois has the floor, is it proper for the gentleman from California to make a speech for him and put words in his mouth?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from California has not done so. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition whatever to travel outside the rules of this House; and I wish to say before I was interrupted by the gentleman from California that my reason for an increase of this appropriation for the Naval Militia is because I realize the attitude which this House must take within a very few days. [Applause.] Now, I say that the United States, exercising its prerogatives and sensible of the duties which have been imposed upon it, must intervene in the struggle between Spain and her subjects in Cuba. The duty of the United States is clear. It should intervene immediately and say to Spain that the long-continued, hopeless, and cruel war in Cuba should cease, and cease at once, and that the inhuman atrocities to which the Cubans are subjected must be stopped at once.

This intervention should not be based upon any mercenary motives growing out of loss or damage to our commerce; it should not be influenced by any visions of territorial aggrandizement; least of all should it proceed from political or partisan considerations. Neither should we be influenced in our action by any desire to establish any special form of government in the Island of Cuba. Our action should proceed solely on the grounds of enlightened humanity. We should say to Spain, with no envy, hatred, or malice, that the present government by starvation in Cuba must end. If we intervene on this ground, and on this ground alone, we shall have the encouraging sympathy of all civilized nations, the approval of posterity, the blessing of a suffering and helpless people, and over and above all and better than all, the benediction of the God of nations.

If this intervention shall result in war let the responsibility rest with Spain. If it shall result in Cuban independence it will be because Spain will be unable to deal justly and peaceably with her own subjects. When we intervene we must be prepared to enforce our demands.

A few days ago by an unprecedented action of Congress there was placed at the disposal of the President the sum of $50,000,000. Then word was flashed from the Pearl of the Antilles to the Pillars of Hercules that if there is to be peace between the United States and Spain it must be an honorable peace, but if there must be war it shall be victorious war.

In performing our duty in this crisis the Navy will play a most important part.

Mr. LOUD. I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed in order in the discussion of the section.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this is a motion, made by the gentleman from New York, increasing the appropriation for the Naval Militia from $60,000 to $100,000. The story of the Naval Militia is a most interesting one and embraces a period of only ten years. From the earliest times our people have borne arms. Every healthy American boy has known the use of firearms from the time of John Smith and Miles Standish to the present time. Only within the last ten years has there been added to the branch of our National Guard a Naval Militia. It was first organized in the State of Massachusetts, and during the last ten years Naval Militia companies have been organized in 17 States. The complement of officers and men in the different States was, a few weeks ago, as follows: Illinois, 566; New York, 520; Massachusetts, 479; California, 424; New Jersey, 405——

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman's time unlimited?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time is not unlimited. It has not expired.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Louisiana, 280; Maryland, 267; Pennsylvania, 234; Ohio, 233; North Carolina, 230; Florida, 220; Michigan, 212; Georgia, 197; Connecticut, 183; South Carolina, 168; Rhode Island, 144; Virginia, 48, or a total of 4,810. Since that enumeration has been made these different battalions have increased until there are now over 5,000 of Naval Militia of the United States, and Illinois heads the list.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wish to add voice in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. I would accept the reasons given by the gentleman from Illinois, and I desire to add to those reasons that in discussing an amendment looking to the increase of the defensive forces upon sea or those upon land it is infinitely appropriate that this House shall be brought to a knowledge of all the conditions which may make such an increase necessary. If it be true, as I gather from the remarks of gentlemen it is, that this Government in any wise expects to intervene in the affairs of any other country, either by peace or by force, it must be recognized by the House that history records instances more innumerable than can be mentioned that war has inevitably followed from such interventions.

It was the history of the intervention of Great Britain, France, and Russia in 1827 in behalf of Greece. It was the result of the intervention of the great powers in 1860 to stop the persecution of the Christians in the land of the Armenians. It has been the continuous cause of conflict in Egypt since the intervention of Great Britain in 1882 in that land. It is infinitely proper at this time, Mr. Chairman, that we should pause to consider that if, for the cause of humanity or liberty, personal or political, this nation should find it appropriate and proper in the exercise of a just discretion for public liberty to intervene in behalf of any people, it should pause, stop, and consider what would be the natural result of such action and to consider the causes that have followed similar courses in other lands.

If this course has made it necessary that the navies of the world be increased, why are not such instances proper for discussion on the floor of this House, in order that we may profit by the examples? We are reminded by the dispatches that the flotilla of that nation which stands in a threatening attitude toward us is moving to the gates of Hampton Roads, to assail, if need be, the gateways of our country. Then by every precedent of defense, every precedent of military provision, it is the duty of the Government to move out and meet the enemy of the United States rather than to let her come to the ports of entry and make war and destruction upon the people of the Union.

Has not the gentleman from Illinois the right to demonstrate these facts before you in order to give the House advice, counsel, and information? I respectfully assert that not only is such his privilege, but such is his duty. It has ever been the duty, says Vattel, who is supported by all the eminent writers since his day, that a nation need not wait for an assault upon it by its enemy, but it should prepare to advance, resent, defeat, and overthrow whatever that advance may be, whether it comes from the individual or whether it comes from the nation. This may now be necessary. We are fools to disguise it any longer, we are timid to temporize with it, we are not patriotic if we any longer delude ourselves. It is unfair to this House that any member shall stand here for a moment and disguise the fact that we are on the eve of a serious encounter, which may mean life or death for the honor of this country.

This is the hour in which we should prepare to meet it, this is the time to prepare to meet it. If it is necessary to "Cry havoc and let slip the dogs of war," then let it be done. None of us desire war, none of us hope for it. We all pray to Heaven against its coming; but there is an hour when action becomes necessary, when it is necessary for us, in view of the conduct of that nation across the sea to send back the message which John Randolph sent her insolent prince, saying:

As we were not bullied by the British lion, we will not be frightened by the Spanish jackal.

[Applause.]

It is necessary that we should prepare to meet the emergency whenever it arises, and for that reason it seems to me we should, and I trust this House may, be liberal in increasing this appropriation, both for the defense of the Union and the maintenance of the cause of those who are struggling for liberty and justice. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would be glad to ask the question of the gentleman from Maine, What was the estimate for the Naval Militia?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. The bill carries $60,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That was the result of a request made of the committee in a hearing given by us to representatives of the naval officers of the militia of different States.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to ask the gentleman a further question, Whether the Secretary of the Navy has by estimate or letter requested the increase of this item beyond the $60,000?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am not aware of any such request. I will say further on that line that the $60,000 was deemed ample for the object embraced within the authorization of this paragraph, and if any addition should be made, it would probably be applied to other provisions which are not enacted into law.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to ask if it is not true, if there be an emergency in the country, the $50,000,000 appropriated for public defenses is not available in this item if further expenditure under the discretion of the President should become necessary?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I should have no question about it.

Mr. CANNON. I am satisfied that that is the case, and if that be the case, it is sufficient to take care of the emergency; and it seems to me after the answer of the gentleman from Maine we had better proceed to enact this bill and to trust the President with the ample emergency appropriation to care for the public service in this respect.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a question.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. LENTZ. Why would it not be well to move to strike out "sixty" and insert "fifty," so that it shall read "$50,000"? Why add the extra $10,000?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will say to the gentleman that this is the regular provision, according to the estimates of the Department, for maintaining all the relations established by law between the Navy Department and these various organizations.

Mr. LENTZ. I understood the gentleman to state in the beginning, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that this sum is $10,000 more than the usual appropriation.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is $10,000 increase, at the request of and on the representations made by the officers of the Naval Militia of the various States, which satisfied the committee that the growth of the organization and the increase of its needs would warrant this increase.

Mr. LENTZ. I understood the gentleman to say, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that he had neither a request nor a report——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. For anything additional to what appears in the bill.

Mr. HANDY. Did not the gentleman say that $50,000 was all the Navy Department had asked for?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I said the Navy Department had estimated for $50,000; that we had granted $10,000 additional on the representations made to the committee by the national officers of the Naval Militia, to which was superadded the recommendation of the Navy Department that we should grant the request.

Mr. HANDY. Then in that way the Navy Department ask for this $10,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They are fully in sympathy with the request of the officers of the militia.

Mr. HANDY. Did they in any formal or informal way ask for this additional appropriation?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will search the files and see whether there was any request in writing or not. My impression is that we did have a letter from the Secretary or the Assistant Secretary.

Mr. FOOTE. Is it not true that at the time when this bill was in preparation the Department had not in contemplation any trouble with any foreign nation; and was not this bill largely based on previous bills? Does it not carry but a small amount more than previous bills? In other words, was not this bill drawn on a peace footing?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No; not as I would understand the gentleman's meaning. We are on a peace footing to-day technically; but at the time when the visits and the representations were made to us by the officers of the Naval Militia the public mind was very much inflamed; there was then a great deal of war talk in the newspapers, as there is now.

Mr. FOOTE. Is it not a fact that this bill carries but little more than previous bills?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman means on this item?

Mr. FOOTE. No; not especially.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Well, then, that question is not germane to this paragraph.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOW. Mr. Chairman, I can heartily support this amendment. The Naval Reserve is a valuable adjunct to our Navy, particularly on our seacoast. It has been in existence about five years. It is composed of some of the best young men in the country, who have been drilling every week with small arms and also taking lessons in seamanship. The amount of the appropriation that has been made from year to year has been $50,000. Now, with the war cloud in sight, the appropriation has been increased by the committee $10,000.

I assure gentlemen of this committee that in the event of hostilities breaking out this Naval Militia force will be of great assistance, particularly in our seaports, to assist in protecting the coast and also manning some of the forts. The men composing this force are not only drilled in heavy ordnance, but in light. I do hope that some encouragement will be given to these young men now that there is an opportunity for them to show what they can do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LOW], who, I believe, is a member of the committee, what use this money would be put to in the event that it should be appropriated and the Naval Reserve of which he speaks should be called into service? Is it not a fact that the Naval Reserve would then be carried on the muster roll of the Navy and be paid out of the appropriations of Congress for the pay of the Navy? Do not the Navy and the Army furnish with arms the men who go into active service?

Mr. LOW. That is so, under this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to vote every dollar necessary; but what I want to know is, What are you going to do with this $40,000 additional if these men are shortly, in the event of war, to be placed on the muster roll of the Navy?

Mr. LOW. In the first place, I will say to the gentleman that in the event of the Government wishing to concentrate this body of men in New York, they could order them even from Illinois.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And pay them?

Mr. LOW. And pay their transportation to and fro.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And pay them their regular pay, also?

Mr. LOW. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And so in reference to clothing and every other item?

Mr. LOW. Aside from that, they might need extra boats.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the Government would furnish the extra boats. We have the information that it bought eighteen yesterday.

Mr. LOW. I am referring to boats to go around in; they have not enough even for our own ships.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is this militia to be a State organization, or is it to be a United States organization?

Mr. LOW. My colleague [Mr. FOOTE] will answer the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I should be glad to answer the gentleman from Ohio and also to give the information to the House.

Mr. FOOTE. I shall be very glad to state what I know on this subject. The only authority we have to arm the Naval Reserve is under this clause. Now, if we do not provide a larger appropriation, then, in the event of our having to call on this Naval Reserve, we shall come up against this very clause allowing only $60,000 for buying arms, accouterments, signal outfits, and everything of that kind for the militia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Where is the authority for increasing the number of the Naval Militia?

Mr. FOOTE. The Naval Militia, as the gentleman will remember, is a State organization, built up by the various States; and the increase will come not from Congress, but from the States. We have naval militiamen now without arms.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from New York to strike out, in line 21, page 9, the word "sixty" and insert "one hundred;" so as to make the appropriation $100,000.

The amendment was rejected, there being—ayes 46, noes 57.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 21, on page 9, the following:

"And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and empowered to use any part of the share of money heretofore or herein appropriated for arming or equipping the Naval Militia forces of the State of Michigan in repairing the damage to the Yantic caused by collision during her transportation from the Boston Navy-Yard to Michigan as the Secretary may deem proper and advisable."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert in line 21, page 9, after the word "dollars," the following:

"And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to apply such part as he may deem necessary of the Naval Militia appropriation now on hand to the credit of any State to furnishing clothing to the Naval Militia of such State."

Mr. ELLIOTT. I hope the gentleman will accept that.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I raise the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine raises a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not see how it violates the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina relates to the appropriation now on hand—money in the hands of the Secretary?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes; that is the purport of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Maine state his point of order?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. My point of order is, first, that it is a change in existing law, there being no law now providing for furnishing clothing for the Naval Militia; and further, that it is precisely what has been passed upon by the House and refused only a few moments ago.

Mr. ELLIOTT. As to the latter point, Mr. Chairman, the former amendment applied to the pending appropriation. This amendment applies to the appropriation now available for such purposes.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This would change the scope of the existing law so far that it might absorb, and very likely would absorb, the entire appropriation, and deprive all of the other purposes now prescribed by law of the opportunity to receive any part of this fund.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should like to ask the gentleman if he knows what the unexpended balance is that is sought to be appropriated?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It makes no difference about that.

Mr. DOCKERY. It may not make any difference to the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It makes no difference on the point of order.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand that, but I thought possibly the gentleman had the information. It seems to me it is clearly subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Maine give his attention for a moment? Is there any existing law providing for furnishing clothing to the Naval Militia?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. There is no such law.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The only law is contained in each appropriation bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is not contemplated or requested, or even suggested officially, that I am aware of.

The CHAIRMAN. On that statement of the gentleman from Maine, the Chair thinks that the point of order should be sustained. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

Equipment of vessels: For purchase of coal for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same; hemp, wire, iron, and other materials for the manufacture of cordage, anchors, cables, galleys, and chains; canvas for the manufacture of sails, awnings, hammocks, and other work; water for steaming purposes; stationery for commanding and navigating officers of ships, equipment officers on shore and afloat, and for the use of courts-martial on board ship, and for the purchase of all other articles of equipment at home and abroad, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels and manufacture of equipment articles in the several navy-yards; foreign and local pilotage and towage of ships of war; services and materials in repairing, correcting, adjusting, and testing compasses on shore and on board ship; nautical and astronomical instruments, and repairs to same; libraries for ships of war; professional books and papers, and drawings and engravings for signal books; naval signals and apparatus, namely, signals, lights, lanterns, rockets, running lights, compass fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ships' compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ship's way, and leads and other appliances for sounding; lanterns and lamps, and their appendages, for general use on board ship, for illuminating purposes, and oil and candles used in connection therewith; bunting and other materials for making and repairing flags of all kinds; photographic instruments and materials; musical instruments and music; and installing and maintaining electric lights and interior signal communications on board vessels of war, $1,483,653.40.

Mr. MAHON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 9, on page 12, after the word "hammocks," insert the following:

"Testing the McAllister-McIlhenny system of armor plating for war vessels."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. MAHON. I have a short statement here which it will take only about three minutes to read. Then, if the gentleman thinks it is out of order, I shall not object. I shall not waste the time of the committee, but I ask the gentleman to reserve his point of order in order that this statement may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the Clerk read a statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The McAllister-McIlhenny system of armor plating is the invention of two young engineers who are well versed in the manufacture of steel. This system has not and will not be patented, as it is of no value except for use on vessels of war; therefore there can be no claims for royalty should the Government decide to adopt it.

The plan is based on scientific principles, and from such tests as the inventors could afford to make has proven to be superior to solid plates. The idea is to use, for example, six plates, 2 inches thick, instead of one solid plate 12 inches thick; the plates to be separated by washers or distance pieces, and the intervening spaces are to be filled with cellulose or similar material. The main idea is to take advantage of the elasticity of the metal, as each plate in turn will have to be bent in until it touches its adjoining plate, before it can be punctured. In the present system of harveyized armor plate, the outer surface alone, for a depth of about 2 inches, is hardened, whereas the center of the plate is steel of but the ordinary hardness. With the proposed system the lighter plates can all be made uniformly hard, thus insuring six harveyized surfaces to but one for the solid plate. The principal advantage of this system is the great reduction in its cost of manufacture. While the solid armor plate varies in cost from $400 to $325 per ton, the McAllister-McIlhenny plating can be made for less than $100 per ton.

Another advantage is that such plating can be made by almost any ordinary steel-plate rolling mill, thus taking it out of the hands of but one or two steel mills which at present control the manufacture of armor plate in this country. It can also be made much more rapidly than the solid plating, which, under existing circumstances, is a decided advantage.

The inventors of this system ask no compensation whatever for its use by the Government.

The plan of manufacture has been submitted to many of the armor experts, and all agree that it is of sufficient promise to warrant a thorough test at the hands of the naval officials.

As the Government alone is to be benefited by the adoption of such a system, it would be in the interests of economy to appropriate this small amount which may develop an armor plate whereby millions of dollars can be saved in the building of battle ships at no sacrifice of their efficiency.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Now I ask that the amendment may be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine raise the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I should like to have the amendment read again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. My point of order is, first, that it is not germane to this paragraph. It could not possibly be included under the head of Bureau of Equipment; and secondly, that it is out of order because it is new legislation. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that no such legislation is necessary, because the Government maintains a proving ground for the purpose of making experiments of this kind, and anything that has merit can be tested by the Department without any such legislation.

Mr. GAINES. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine if he maintains that these parties have a right to demand of the Government that it shall test this process at the Government proving ground?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I say that the Government is supplied with facilities and with authority to make all experiments that in its judgment or in the judgment of its officers will tend to advance the public interest.

Mr. GAINES. Then what harm can there be in putting in here a provision providing for that?

Mr. CANNON. That would compel the Government to do it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is a matter of judgment for every gentleman on the floor to determine for himself. It is not in order at this point of the bill. It is enacting new legislation, and is not, in my judgment, desirable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to have the discussion confined to the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I have nothing to say on the point of order.

Mr. GAINES. I want to get some information from the gentleman from Maine, and I think he can give it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is it?

Mr. GAINES. Will you please explain to the House the process of experiment down there, and who pays for it?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not desire to take up the time of the House to do that at this time.

Mr. GAINES. I do not think the House would object.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is not pertinent to this point of order.

Mr. GAINES. I think I will show to the House a little later on why the gentleman does not explain it.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. MAHON. This section of the bill is for the Bureau of Equipment. It provides for the purchase of hemp, wire, iron, and other materials for the manufacture of cordage, anchors, cables, etc. I do not see why this would not be in order, to test the armor which is as much a part of the equipment of a vessel as any of these things. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Navy is provided with money to make tests, but the plates must be provided by the armor makers. These two young naval officers, of whom one is an expert who inspects all the steel that goes into these vessels, ask no appropriation; but this means that the Secretary of the Treasury can expend a few hundred dollars in having a plate prepared to stand this test.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question right there? If this provision is not adopted, can the test be made?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; then it is new legislation. It provides for something being done that can not, under existing law, be done.

Mr. MAHON. The Secretary of the Navy can not buy anchors or cables except under this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. MAHON. No; he can not.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman from Maine says there is a provision for this, and I ask him is there a provision by which these gentlemen can go down there and demand that the Government shall conduct such experiments, and demand the use of these machines?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is perfectly obvious that it is not permissible for every man in the United States, of seventy-odd millions of population, to go somewhere and demand that something be done. We have proving grounds for testing all appliances and all materials that are deemed desirable to test, that present such facts and such arguments in their favor as will convince the officers who are experts that the material is desirable.

Mr. MAHON. This is to determine that question with reference to these materials.

Mr. TODD. Can the gentleman tell the House whether it is a patented process; and if so, who are the owners of the patent, and whether any officers of the Government have any interest in it, either as owners or attorneys?

Mr. MAHON. No; it is young men who are in the employ of the Government. Government officers can not receive a royalty on a patent that is used while they are in the service.

Mr. TODD. The reason I asked the question is because in a report already submitted to Congress (Senate Report No. 1453, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session) it is shown that officers of the Navy, away up in the Government employ, had secured an interest in certain patents for making naval armor, and, in collusion with other Government officials and the armor-plate manufacturers, had forced the Government to pay immense royalties for the use of patents, and the people have been robbed of millions of dollars.

It is in evidence (Pages VI–VII) that a commander in the United States Navy, while drawing pay from our Government, was actually working against it, and received a salary from the steel company of $5,000 per annum, besides dividends on $20,000 of stock (which the company probably donated to him) of 20 per cent per annum, so that he received for working against his Government $10,000 per year while he was drawing heavy pay as a supposed trusted officer.

But this corruption in Government does not stop here. A Republican Secretary of the Navy is shown to also have had very questionable relations in these transactions. Patents injurious to the nation's interest and in the interest of the steel trust were "expedited" by him while Secretary of the Navy, and he has since been in the employ of the trust as "counsel" against the nation which had honored him with its confidence. (See Pages VII, XX–XXI, etc.) The policy of the trusts seems to be to "retain" influential officers both in the legislative and executive departments of Government, and thus secure such action as the interests of the trusts rather than those of the nation require.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Bureau of Equipment: For freight and transportation of equipment stores, packing boxes and materials, printing, advertising, telegraphing, books, and models; stationery for the Bureau; furniture for equipment offices in navy-yards; postage on letters sent abroad; ferriage, ice, lighterage of ashes, and emergencies arising under cognizance of the Bureau of Equipment unforeseen and impossible to classify, $15,000; and section 431, Revised Statutes, is hereby amended by striking out the word "navigation" and inserting the word "equipment."

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order as to the last clause of this paragraph—the clause providing that section 431 of the Revised Statutes be amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves the point of order on that clause of the section.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Chairman, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois as to the change of section 431 of the Revised Statutes, I desire to say that this was done at the request of the Department itself. The Hydrographic Bureau was found to be in the wrong bureau, and it was deemed advisable to change that to another bureau; and that is all the effect of that change of the statute.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, that Hydrographic Bureau or Office has been a part of the Bureau of Navigation for thirty-two years, and the necessity for a change never seems to have occurred before. If there is a necessity for that change, it ought to be brought before the House in a measure depending upon the propriety of the change itself, and not be brought in here in this way as a part of an appropriation bill, and in the very objectionable way by striking out one word of a section of the Revised Statutes, so that if anyone desires to know what the law is he must take a copy of the Revised Statutes and read the section as it is there and then take this statute and see what word of that section is stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I therefore feel that the point of order should be insisted upon.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Chairman, in the earlier days of our Navy Department navigation was more important than it is now. In the days of wooden ships the navigating officer was more of a factor than he is now, when our ships are built of metal and machinery constitutes so great an element.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The gentleman will remember that that section was first made a part of the Revised Statutes in 1866. We were then using armor-plated vessels, and had been during the war of the rebellion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see what that has to do with the point of order.

Mr. HILBORN. What is that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair fails to see what the suggestion of the gentleman from California has to do with the point of order.

Mr. HILBORN. This is a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Bureau of Yards and Docks: For contingent expenses that may arise at navy-yards and stations, $20,000.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House——

The CHAIRMAN. What motion does the gentleman make?

Mr. GAINES. I move to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of the House, since we are passing on a provision touching on the purchase of coal for the use of the Government, to a comparison of prices between the cost of coal in Pennsylvania and the South.

We are producing down in Alabama and Tennessee, and I take it other portions of the South, material used in the manufacture of armor plate. Both sets of figures are authentic.

The Eastern prices are taken from Secretary Herbert's report of 1897, and are the figures at which these materials are sold to the Government, in the shape of armor plate, by Carnegie. The Southern rates are equally as authentic, given me last summer by Col. A. M. Shook, vice-president of the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company, one of the largest iron and coal concerns in the United States, doing business in Tennessee and Alabama.

Pig iron is sold by this company and the Sheffield Company, as shown by the testimony taken by the Armor Factory Board, at from $5.60 to $6 per ton. Tabulating these figures, we have a remarkable showing in favor of the South.

	Carnegie & Co.	South.
Pig iron ..... per ton..	$12.50	$6.00
Iron ore ..... do....	3.05	.50
Slack coal	1.00	.25
Coke ..... per ton..	2.50	1.75
Limestone	1.15	.45
Total	20.20	8.95

Difference in favor of the South, $11.25.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, in the face of these facts, not one ton of coal has been purchased in the South in our preparation for war in Cuba, so far as my vigilance has been able to ascertain, although this Southern region is a thousand miles nearer to Key West than the territory that has furnished it.

Mr. Chairman, I want now to advert to a matter which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] studiously avoided just now when I questioned him, and that is the expense that the Government undergoes in testing this armor plate. He says we have a testing ground, and we are now providing for that expense. I want now to know who pays the expense of the test? Say twelve armor plates are sent down here for examination.

The most defective looking one is picked out to stand the test. It is put up and shot at. It is purposely destroyed, as near as possible. If it stands the test, the other eleven are presumed to be even better than this, are accepted, and the Government pays for the whole twelve, including the cost of testing.

Now, who stands the loss of this twelfth plate that is shot at? If the plate stands the test, the Government loses; if not, the contractor bears the loss. The plate, on an average, for one ship is from 2,600 tons to 2,800 tons, which has cost the Government on an average of $617 a ton, and there are 40 tons to the battle ship plates, the smaller plates being from 10 to 15 tons.

In other words, we pay for twelve plates and get eleven we use for plate. We pay for the powder; we pay for the whole experiment in the event we succeed. Now, I do not know of just such an inevitable and dead loss to any other Government on earth. England has an armor-plate factory, and we do not hear of it. She stands first in the calendar of our great naval nations. France is next, and has an armor-plate factory——

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me an interruption?

Mr. GAINES. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. There is no nation on the face of the earth that has an armor-plate factory except Russia.

Mr. GAINES. I am glad that the gentleman admits that Russia has one. I will show him in a minute that he is mistaken as to the other countries. I have here a letter from the chancellor and attaché of the French embassy. France has Government armor factories; and they have all sorts of factories that go to make that nation second only to England.

Mr. SWANSON. What legation?

Mr. GAINES. The French legation. I will read the letter, if I can find it. It is here, I know.

Mr. DALZELL. There are numerous armor-plate factories scattered all over Europe; there are a number in France and in England, but there is no Government armor-plate factory except in Russia.

Mr. GAINES. I have the letter here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES. I hope I may be allowed to proceed long enough to read this letter. This is signed by the representative of the legation here. I read:

EMBASSADE DE FRANCE, AUX ETATS UNIS,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1898.

DEAR SIR: My inability to confer before this with the military attaché of this embassy prevented me, to my regret, from replying any sooner to your favor of the 13th instant. France builds a part of her men-of-war, armor plate, and artillery in Government establishments. The rest is constructed by private industries. This mode is followed so as to allow the Government to be independent of private industries in time of peace. On the other hand, in case of war, the Government needs the assistance of private industries, and it would be too late to improvise them in cases of emergencies. For these reasons recourse is had to both sources of production.

Very truly, yours,

JULES BOEUFVE, Chancellor.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I also have another letter here from the secretary and chargé d'affaires of the Italian embassy, Count Vinci:

AMBASCIATA DI S. M. LI RE D'ITALIA,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1898.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of January 13, to which I take pleasure in answering.

In a general way I can say that the Government of Italy owns the navy-yards and its own docks where the war ships are built, and owns its plants for the manufacture of war material and naval construction, also for the forging of armor plates. However, no law prevents the Royal Government to make its ordnance to private industry, and in the late times some of our naval constructions were entirely committed to them; so that a combined system is probably to prevail in the future.

Be pleased to accept, sir, the expression of my consideration.

Respectfully, yours,

COUNT VINCI,
Chargé d'Affaires for Italy.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
Member of the House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Chairman, England stands first, and has her armor-plate factory; France stands second, and has hers; Russia stands third, and has hers, says the distinguished authority from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]; Italy stands fourth, and has hers; the United States stands fifth, without any of her own; Spain stands sixth, and has hers; while Japan stands seventh, and has hers and is preparing to build more.

I believe there are authorities of high standing that say that Japan in her naval force stands second only to England. She has one armor factory, and her agent has just left this country, where he has been gathering information preparatory to erecting another. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Detroit Tribune of January 31, 1898, which says in part:

By establishing a Government arsenal at Woolwich, Great Britain has made a saving of about 50 per cent on the production of her war machinery, and private firms found that they could no longer charge fancy prices because the nation was their patron. This will no doubt prove true in the case of the United States.

This editorial was espousing the cause of building a Government armor factory in that city.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one or two points more and I will not further trench upon the kind attention of the House. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] on Monday stated that Mr. Secretary Herbert recommended a $400 proposition to this House for the purchase of armor plate. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] stated that he voted for the $300 proposition because an Illinois concern had agreed to make it for $300. I want to say that the gentleman from Ohio was mistaken; that there was no Illinois proposition considered; that the $300 proposition was made upon the testimony taken by this House and by the Senate upon that subject.

Commander Elmer states that the cost of armor plate should be no more than $250. Commodore Rodgers stated it should be no more than $250. Germany is paying $250 for her armor plate, and so upon the testimony elicited by the two committees they reported that $300 was the proper amount, and upon that report this House adopted the $300 proposition. Now, they say the reason why we can not get the $300 proposition to go through was because we could not get any bids. Well, of course, if that is the case, that is a complete excuse; but why set that up?

It is because we have only two armor-plate factories in the country that are working for the Government, and the way they do is that they will not bid against each other. The Government gives them all the work that we have to do. Indeed, this bill provides that this armor-plate business shall be confined exclusively to the manufactories of the United States, when we have but two and they will not compete.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy any time; I only want to say that when this subject is properly before the committee and when it is in order under the rules of the House, I propose to discuss it. It is manifest that the paragraph under discussion has no reference whatever to armor plate.

Mr. GAINES. I am well aware of that, but the interruption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania turned me to that subject from "coal," which I desired to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his amendment?

Mr. GAINES. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Civil establishment, Bureau of Yards and Docks: Navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H.: For one clerk, at $1,400; one mail messenger, at $2 per diem, including Sundays; one messenger, at $900; one foreman laborer and head teamster, at $4 per diem, including Sundays; one janitor, at $900; one pilot, at $3 per diem, including Sundays; in all, $5,885.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation which this bill contemplates can not, under all the circumstances, fail to meet the approval of every loyal American who appreciates the situation. For years it has been a sad reflection upon our wisdom and foresight that until recently the strength of our Navy has been wholly incommensurate to the strength and dignity of the nation. It has been a cause of reproach to us that some of the weakest and most insignificant nations of the earth could have swept our commerce from the seas. With our imperfect coast defenses we were practically at the mercy of the foreign invader. It seems that only an extraordinary exigency like the present could arouse us from our lethargy and awake us to a realization of our humiliating and perilous position.

Here we have stood, halting, hesitating to grapple with the weakest, the rottenest, the most corrupt Government that ever disgraced the earth; because we were not ready to defend ourselves; halting, hesitating, waiting, while the cries and groans and agonizing appeals of the starving and dying are ringing in our ears. [Applause.] Nay, even our own President is insulted, our countrymen are imprisoned and murdered, our ships destroyed before our very eyes, while the voice of the people is calling in no uncertain tone, demanding that in the name of God and humanity we take the decisive step which will stop this reign of carnage. [Applause.] Cuban belligerency was the remedy, but now it is war. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, is it possible that any argument is needed to convince this House that our Navy ought to be strengthened? All the nations of the earth, even the most insignificant, are increasing their navies. Shall we fall behind in the march of progress? Can any one deny that our vast and increasing commerce must be protected? Can we afford to fail in maintaining our dignity before the world? We ought with as much alacrity and unanimity to vote for this bill as we voted for that fifty millions for the President. That appropriation may have been a mistake, because it should have been one hundred millions instead of fifty. This may be a mistake only because it is inadequate. Let us no longer hang our heads in shame at the mention of our Navy, but build one commensurate with the greatness of our nation.

I am as much in favor of this bill as I am opposed to any appropriation for increasing the standing Army. An efficient Navy and strong coast defenses will give us dignity in the eyes of the world and protect us from foreign encroachments. It is but obedience to nature's first law of self-defense. A large and expensive Army can serve no purpose whatever, except as a menace to our own people. A standing Army does not insure peace; it has the opposite effect of inciting hatred and violence. The protection we need is against foreign invaders, and only a Navy is effective for that purpose. In emergencies we need only to call upon our citizens. They are always ready. The American volunteer is as good a soldier as ever trod the field of battle. [Applause.]

It seems to me that the desirability and absolute necessity of this proposed naval appropriation is so apparent that the question is not debatable. The only question to-day is, What kind of a Navy? If we had a formidable Navy, the Spanish flotilla to-day would not be steaming toward America. If the Spanish flotilla is on its way, further hesitation and delay are dangerous. [Applause.]

A war between the United States and Spain at this time would be fraught with deep significance. It would result not only in the freedom of Cuba, but the exaltation of a principle which would be an object lesson to the world for all time. It would not be simply the United States pitted against Spain; it would be the opposing forces which have been at work shaping human destiny through all the ages. On the one hand, the shriveled and decrepit survival of a semibarbarous system of oppression, cruelty, inhumanity, and violence; on the other, civil and religious liberty, equality, human rights, progress. On the one hand, the divine right of kings; on the other, the divine right of man. [Applause.] Why need we shrink from such a conflict? Such a war would be a blessing to the world. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of congratulation to the country, and to this House in particular, that the prospect of a foreign war has had the salutary effect of cementing the Union as it has never been before. This effect is perhaps nowhere more noticeable than upon the floor of this House. That there exists a kindlier feeling and a more courteous manner between members of opposing parties must be apparent to everyone, notwithstanding the occasional undignified exchange of sharp personalities, which by their frequency in the past have sometimes subjected this body to severe criticism. Of late, however, these exhibitions have, as a rule, given way to genuine expressions of lofty patriotism, worthy of our glorious heritage and the exalted position we occupy among the nations of the earth.

The people of the United States at the first alarm of war have rushed together in defense of the nation's honor with a magnificent abandon which has been the astonishment and admiration of the world. This final and beautiful reconciliation between the North and the South is especially gratifying to us who are affiliated by ties of blood to both sections. In a country like ours, of such wide extent and diversified resources, it is but natural that there should be some conflict of interests, and sectionalism more or less pronounced the inevitable result. It is but fulfilling a law of nature that every man's point of view is the standpoint of his own personal interests. Only the broadest and most liberal patriotism can cause a representative of the manufacturing East to put himself in the place and view with sympathy the position of the new South with her growing industries, proving herself so apt a pupil of New England.

Much has been said about these two sections in recent discussions on this floor and but little in behalf of the West. The West, in her struggle for recognition, must stoutly maintain her own claims or be, as she has been, utterly ignored. For, be it understood, in all our glorious country no section has been so misunderstood and so underrated as the West. The great West, with its capacity to feed the world, its boundless resources of mineral and agricultural wealth, its population representing the youth, the energy, the ambition, the patriotism, and the intelligence of the ideal American citizenship—this section, I say, which any man might be proud to call his home, has been misunderstood, and underrated, and ignored, and discriminated against.

The natural outgrowth of this state of things is the much-abused and maligned Populist party, which is the exponent of all that is best of pure Americanism. The two States, Kansas and Nebraska, which are now controlled by that party, stand in the vanguard of progressive States. The percentage of illiteracy in these States is less than any two States in the Union. These two States present more nearly the ideal of pure democracy which possessed the founders of the Republic. The old question is flung back at us to-day, "Can any good come out of Nazareth?" The same answer is applicable as of yore, "Come and see."

The people who compose this much-maligned party are the bone and sinew of the land—intelligent farmers and wage earners, who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow—honest, God-fearing men, the type of men who always come to the country's rescue in the hour of peril. Many of them are the sons of Revolutionary sires. It is for these, the rank and file, the great masses of the common people, for whom the Populist party stands sponsor. [Applause.] The Populist party is a protest against the encroachments of plutocracy and every un-American barnacle which has fastened itself upon the old ship of state.

It sounds a solemn warning against the present rapid drift from the simplicity of our fathers. It is the advocate of progress, of reform, of liberty, equality, fraternity; of all that is highest and best in American institutions. Is it a matter of wonder, then, that this party, established upon the sure foundations of truth and justice, has, in the face of scorn and ridicule, already lived to see its principles accepted and ingrafted upon the old parties, and while official recognition has been grudgingly given it, yet has steadily and unfalteringly maintained its position? That this party is a wonderful factor for good is an unquestionable fact. The cause of its rise and growth has been unjust discrimination; discrimination not only against a class but against a section—a section upon which the country depends for its very sustenance.

This appropriation, like most of appropriations which have passed this House, will directly benefit the East. We of the West have no seaboard cities, no shipyards, no dry docks, no factories or manufactories to be directly benefited; yet we are ready to take our guns in hand, to cross the continent, and join with you in giving our lives and treasure in our country's defense. [Applause.] In saying this I voice the sentiment of the Populist party. [Applause.]

There are two appropriations which I most heartily indorse. One is to build up a formidable navy; the other is to provide for the old soldiers.

We are all conscious that this is a most solemn and trying hour. We have hoped and prayed that war might be averted. But we stand face to face with the inevitable. The President's course since the fifty millions appropriation has met with universal approval. Congress and the country have waited with marvelous patience for him to work out a definite policy. At last his supreme hour has come. His duty is clear. If he performs it, he will be supported to a man. If he falters or wavers, a mighty and irresistible storm of indignation will sweep over this country.

Vox populi, vox Dei. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Brooklyn, N. Y.: For dredging Whitney Basin and Wallabout, to continue, $50,000; quay wall between dry dock No. 1 and Main street, $60,000; quay wall, coal dock, to complete, $30,000; grading and sewering between dry dock and Clinton avenue, to continue, $10,000; grading and paving causeway and roads around docks, $20,000; storehouse for steel (for construction and repair), $17,500; oil and varnish storehouse (supplies and accounts), $46,300; paving streets, $5,000; addition to electric-light system, $15,000; replacing storehouse (building No. 31), condemned as dangerous and removed, $49,837; conversion of building No. 8 into two-story fireproof storehouse for ordnance material, to be immediately available, $24,500; in all, $323,137.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I observe in the paragraph just read the words "paving streets, $5,000." I should like to know the meaning of that. Where are the streets for the paving of which we are appropriating $5,000?

Mr. HILBORN. Outside of the reservation itself the Government is an abutting proprietor, and has to pay, like anybody else, its share for the improvement of the streets.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Allow me to say that there are many miles of streets in the Brooklyn Navy-Yard on land owned by the Government.

Mr. LENTZ. I understood the gentleman from California [Mr. HILBORN] to say that these streets are on the outside.

Mr. CUMMINGS. No, they are in the navy-yard proper—within the walls. These streets are being used continually for the transportation of heavy material, and they get out of order just as much as the streets in the commercial parts of the great cities of the United States where heavy drays are used. It is absolutely necessary that these streets should be kept in order, especially at a time like this.

Mr. HILBORN. I made a mistake in the statement I just made. I had in mind another case, where we have made an appropriation for improving the streets outside of the Government grounds at Annapolis.

Mr. LENTZ. I only wanted to say that if an appropriation of this kind is to be made——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is not this a departure from the practice of the United States?

Mr. CUMMINGS. It is not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I mean the paving of streets on the outside.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think there is no navy-yard in the United States where there is any paving on the outside of any of the public grounds except at Annapolis, and there a special arrangement has been made with the city authorities, under which they pay part of the expense and the Government pays the other part.

Mr. HILBORN. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] first raised this question, I supposed he was referring to the case at Annapolis. That is the only case of the kind.

Mr. LENTZ. Then, as I understand, the streets for the paving of which we expend $5,000 are within the Government grounds?

Mr. HILBORN. They are all within the reservation—all on the land of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval station, Port Royal, S. C.: Quay wall, $15,000; repair shop (for steam engineering), $50,000; for the payment of the amounts awarded to the owners of the several tracts of land at the naval station, Port Royal, S. C., recently condemned for the use of the United States, in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated for the purchase of land at that station, $20,325.50; in all, $85,325.50: Provided, That none of the above amounts appropriated for the naval station at Port Royal shall be available or used until the United States shall have acquired all right and title to the land claimed by Agnes A. Niver adjacent to the land where the dry dock now is, and involved in litigation in the United States Court of Claims, except that $1,000 of the $15,000 appropriated for the quay wall may be used to preserve the same.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I make a point of order on the proviso at the close of the paragraph just read. It is a change of existing law. It provides that none of the $85,000 appropriated in this paragraph shall be expended "until the United States shall have acquired all right and title to the land claimed by Agnes A. Niver adjacent to the land where the dry dock now is."

My contention is that this is a change in existing law, there being now no law providing for the acquiring of that property. Section 3736 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the subject of acquiring lands, provides:

No lands shall be purchased on account of the United States except under a law authorizing the purchase.

No law can be produced authorizing the purchase of this property. Nor can it be contended that it is a part of the property now owned by the United States and upon which the dry dock stands, because it would be absurd to pretend that the Government is to buy its own land. Besides, as the Chairman will observe, the language of the proviso is, "adjacent to the land where the dry dock now is." Here is a plain direction that the United States shall acquire a piece of property for the acquirement of which there is no authority of existing law.

Can anyone doubt, Mr. Chairman, as to what the duty imposed upon the Secretary of the Navy would be if this matter went through as it now stands? Why, he would have to acquire title to that property if he could. The whole appropriation for this most important station and dry dock is made dependent upon the United States acquiring title to property which, as appears from the proviso, the United States does not own. Of course it goes without saying that the United States does not own the property if it is required to acquire the title of any person.

Mr. OGDEN. The property seems to be in litigation now in the Court of Claims.

Mr. ELLIOTT. There is now a suit pending, it appears by the proviso, over this property in the Court of Claims. It is required that the United States shall acquire title to it. It seems to me that the provision is plainly subject to the point of order. It could have no meaning unless it were intended that the proper officers of the Government should feel bound, upon the passage of this bill, to acquire title to that property. Therefore it is intended to be a change of law. I do not see how there can be any question on the subject.

Mr. DAYTON. I desire, on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to call the attention of the Chair, on this point of order, to the fact that if it should be held to be well taken, it would simply destroy the appropriation entirely, because an examination of the proviso will make very plain and very clear the fact that it is simply a limitation upon an appropriation that is provided by this provision. Of course the limitation is proper, it being a new appropriation; and if the point of order should go against it, it will go against the whole section. It seems to me that that is all that is necessary to be said upon the point of order. When it comes to the question of the wisdom of this proviso, then the committee desire to be heard.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. LENTZ. Have we not a naval station at Port Royal now?

Mr. DAYTON. Why, certainly, we have a naval station at Port Royal.

Mr. LENTZ. Then if the proviso should fall, why would that defeat the appropriation?

Mr. DAYTON. Simply because this provision as a whole makes an appropriation to that naval station, to be available upon certain conditions. That is no violation of the rule, and therefore the appropriation goes with the proviso.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman from West Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Will not the appropriation stand if the proviso is stricken out?

Mr. DAYTON. It would stand if it were amended so that it would be an independent and unconditional appropriation.

Mr. WILSON. By striking out the proviso, do you not effect that amendment?

Mr. DAYTON. I say that when that amendment is made, I desire to be heard as to the wisdom of it; but upon the point of order, the appropriation stands here as a conditional appropriation.

Mr. WILSON. Then the point of order would strike out your proviso, if it is sustained.

Mr. DAYTON. The point of order, it seems to me, can not change the character of the appropriation.

Mr. ELLIOTT. This is not simply a limitation upon the expenditure of money, but it is a matter foreign to the particular subject under consideration. It is not a direction how the money shall be spent, which would be putting a limitation upon it, but it is a plain requirement of law that the United States shall acquire title to this property. As I said a moment ago, could anyone doubt if this bill passes that it would be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to acquire title to that property? The whole $85,000 is tied up, suspended, hung up in the air, upon the condition that the Government shall acquire that piece of property. And you observe——

Mr. CLARDY. Do I understand you to say that there is no law by which the United States Government can acquire title to land that it needs for public purposes?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Only in certain cases. They can acquire title for certain purposes.

Mr. CLARDY. Is it not competent for the United States Government, the same as any public corporation, to condemn land for the purposes of the Government? Could they not acquire title to this land in the same way?

Mr. ELLIOTT. There must be an act of Congress authorizing the condemnation. There is no general law on the subject authorizing the condemnation of land in all cases. There must be an act authorizing the condemnation.

Mr. CLARDY. Do you mean there must be an act for every specific condemnation?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes; either a special act or a general law covering certain classes of property. This is not one of those cases covered by any general law.

Mr. DAYTON. If the gentleman will pardon me, simply to illustrate the point of order, I suppose it would be conceded by him, would it not, that this House could refuse to make any appropriation at all to this station?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not see that that bears on the point of order.

Mr. DAYTON. Then if the House can refuse to make any appropriation at all, it can certainly make an appropriation conditional in its character and limited to the occurrence of certain events.

Mr. ELLIOTT. But not upon a condition that involves new legislation; and here is legislation requiring the United States to acquire title to property for which there is no law now in force.

Mr. DAYTON. Then, if that be true, will not the whole provision go out?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That has been answered already most satisfactorily by my colleague [Mr. WILSON]. The appropriation would be perfectly good without the proviso, and I am making a point of order only on the proviso.

Mr. ROBBINS. I should like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina what part of the $85,000 is tied up by the litigation with Agnes A. Niver? I admit that it is hardly pertinent to the point of order.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Why, it applies to the whole appropriation, for the machine shop and everything else.

Mr. ROBBINS. I know it applies to the whole appropriation, but what part is tied up?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I will explain to the gentleman just how it stands. We have a dry dock at that point, and a machine shop——

Mr. DAYTON. It seems to me this is not pertinent to the point of order. When the amendment is made, if there be one, the committee stand ready to explain these things.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair clearly that this is a limitation. Following the line of decisions that have been made in that respect and so regarding this proviso, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I wish to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 22, page 23, strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including line 5 on page 24.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, as to the propriety of that proviso, the committee will understand that all of the appropriations for the perfection of that dry dock are tied up and suspended until the United States shall acquire title to a piece of property that is in dispute. It seems, Mr. Chairman, that there is a suit pending over some property adjacent to the dry dock, not a part of the dry dock, but adjacent to it.

Now, in this condition of things the Naval Committee placed this proviso in the bill, and wants the Committee of the Whole to adopt a legislative declaration in favor of a party who is suing the United States for the value of the use and occupation of the property. That would be a legislative declaration in behalf of the claimant's title. The United States claims this property, and is in possession, and the action of the House would be a declaration that the United States is not the owner of the property, but that the title is in the claimant, Mrs. Niver. I think it very bad policy to adopt this proviso.

As I said, that dock is one of the most important in the country. It has already taken in the battle ship Indiana. She went in and out without any difficulty. This is just the time when a dock of that sort is most needed, and it is proposed to tie up indefinitely the appropriation for its improvement. How can anyone know when that litigation will be terminated? When the Court of Claims decides the case, there may, and probably will, be an appeal to the Supreme Court, and it would be pending there for at least two or three years, during the whole of which time nothing could be done for the improvement of the dock. Now, how is the United States to acquire title to a piece of property which it owns?

They can not compel Mrs. Niver to convey the property, and the United States can not condemn it, because the United States now claims the land and is in possession of it; so how can this proviso ever be carried into effect? How can the matter ever be determined? The United States will be absolutely powerless, because Mrs. Niver may refuse to sell the land and the United States can not condemn it. So it is an impossible condition that the committee has asked to be inserted in the bill. Moreover, the question of title can not be decided in this suit. I quote from the case of Hill against The United States in 149 U. S. Reports of the Supreme Court, page 593:

A claim by a person asserting title in land under tide water for damages for the use and occupation thereof by the United States for the erection and maintenance of a light-house, without his consent and without compensation to him, but not showing that the United States have acknowledged any right of property in him as against them, is a case sounding in tort on which the circuit court of the United States has no jurisdiction under the act of March 3, 1887, chapter 359.

So that the title can never be determined in this suit.

Mr. LENTZ. I would like to hear what the gentleman is saying. I have not been able to hear even at this distance.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The committee will be in order, and the gentleman will suspend until we have order.

Mr. ELLIOTT. This suit must ultimately be dismissed on a question of jurisdiction, and therefore no adjudication can be had upon the question involved. I submit again——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that it would be extremely bad policy to procrastinate in the use of this appropriation until certain litigation can be disposed of. We all know what litigation means; we all know that it runs on and on for years and years; and this is no time for delay in improving naval stations. It has been shown by argument after argument made on the floor of this House that we need an expenditure not merely of $50,000,000, but of hundreds of millions to put our Navy and our coast defenses in a proper condition.

With such a nation as this, I say it is pusillanimous, petty, small business to talk about delaying this matter until certain litigation can be terminated. Let us go on and expend this money and make the improvement, if we do encroach on somebody's acre. Government has this right at all times, and particularly in a time like this. The Government is amply able to pay for the land at the proper time. We know not whether anybody has any title adverse to the Government. I repeat it, that this is not the occasion for delay for such a trifle as that. With this Spanish flotilla approaching our country, we ought to expend millions at once, so that no hostile fleet will ever again approach the American Continent.

Why, take the Franco-Prussian war for example. We hear a great deal about international law. I say there is a growth in international law just as there is in the means of lighting and transportation. In 1870 what was the cause of the Franco-Prussian war? It was suspected by the French that the house of Hohenzollern would put Leopold on the throne of Spain. After Leopold declined the proffered crown, Emperor Napoleon III demanded that King William should not only prevent Leopold from ascending that throne, but that he should agree then and there that at no time in the future should any descendant of the Hohenzollern family ever become a candidate for the crown of Spain.

Why? Because they declared it was a menace to the peace of France and the peace of Europe to unite the interests of these two powers. And because the Prussian King refused to enter into any such agreement as that, French troops were on German soil within a few weeks, and that led to the Franco-Prussian war and a victory that will forever remain the glory of Germany. I say that the Spanish navy does not approach this country for any good purpose; it is a menace to our peace and the peace of the Western Hemisphere, and it is boys' play to stop now and talk about acquiring title. This money ought to be expended to-morrow and this naval station prepared for immediate action.

That is my view of this question, and I hope that this amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina will be voted for unanimously—with the same unanimity that was shown when we voted for the fifty million appropriation a few days ago. It is along the same line. There is no use deceiving ourselves. The nation that stands idle and impotent while an enemy approaches with all the accouterments of war is nothing less than a coward; and I am not willing to say, as a member of this House, that the people of my district are afraid to appropriate millions of dollars to prepare at every point on the coast of this country to meet such an enemy; and this station is only a part of the necessary machinery of war not only against Spain, but against every country in the world.

Mr. Chairman, I said that we have new international law. The Monroe doctrine is new international law. And all decent nations will join in making more new law to meet the brutality and barbarity that now shocks all mankind aware of the conditions in Cuba. Nobody was ever burned at the stake for opinion's sake where the bigot who fanned the flames was not the wrongdoer while the sufferer was doing God's will. No people on the face of the earth will starve to death, as the Cubans are now doing, rather than surrender, unless they are doing God's service. Cuban women and children have suffered more than being burned at the stake, and for the American people to stand idle now, seeing these Cubans from day to day sink dead into old mother earth from starvation, is cowardly and mean on our part.

Our hearts must be petrified, like those of the Spaniards, to see that going on at our very doorsteps without protest or intervention. Let us expedite this bill. Let us appropriate more for the Navy, and in the name of humanity not wait for the disposition of a case at court. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I speak on behalf of the committee in opposition to this amendment. I want to say to the members of the Committee of the Whole House that the effort to inspire the belief that this appropriation is necessary as an emergency measure, with all due respect, has no foundation whatever. This is simply an appropriation for a naval station providing for the additional quay wall, a repair shop, and for the purchase of additional real estate at a point where this naval station is located.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. DAYTON. I will after I get through. The trouble and difficulty about this is that the committee has the honest and sincere belief that it is not wise to increase our station there, either by purchase of land or by the building of new and additional works, until we have the land that gives us the entry into the dry dock so that we can use it. That is precisely the condition we have confronting us in regard to this matter.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman now permit me a question?

Mr. DAYTON. I will if it is brief.

Mr. LENTZ. Do not you admit by what you are saying that we need immediately an appropriation of $50,000 for the repair shop and $15,000 for the wall?

Mr. DAYTON. Not as an emergency.

Mr. LENTZ. I did not say as an emergency.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to say that before the repair shop and quay wall can be well built, in my humble judgment, we could whip two or three nations like Spain. [Laughter.] But that is neither here nor there. The motion is on the permanent improvement of this naval station, and we are confronted with this situation, that the land between low-water mark and high-water mark, right at the very entrance of the dock we have built there, is claimed by a private party, and it is in litigation in the United States court. We now have in the Court of Claims a claim for $20,000 for the use of this land so far.

This land is held under a grant of the commonwealth of the State the members of which are here insisting that we should go on and improve the buildings at this naval station, if this sworn claim is true, before we have any right to enter the dock at all. Now, I want to call the committee's attention to the fact that these gentlemen who represent this station are persistent and urgent in asking us to make an appropriation when that claim has been pending in the Court of Claims five years, and neither they nor the Department, until the 28th of February last, have ever asked that it might be advanced and determined. Therefore your committee deemed it wise and proper to have an end to this litigation.

I suggest that the Navy Department, as well as the people interested in this naval station down there, should see to it that this claim is adjudicated instead of compelling us to take simply the ex cathedra opinion of the Department that there is nothing in that claim, that it is not a proper charge, and that the title is in fact in the United States. If it be true that there is nothing in it, then this claim of Agnes A. Niver ought not to appear here, on the one hand, asking us to give her $8,000 or $10,000 out of this appropriation for another piece of land, and at the same time claiming $20,000 from us for the very piece of land that furnishes an entrance to the very dry dock whereby we have any interest there at all. This matter could be settled, if it is such an easy claim, within the next sixty or the next thirty days, when this appropriation then will become available.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DAYTON. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on this paragraph be now closed.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia moves that the debate on this paragraph—with amendments?

Mr. DAYTON. With amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. With amendments be now closed.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have a right, I think, to speak in opposition to the gentleman's amendment. I rose to address the Chair as soon as the gentleman's time had expired and I think the Chair recognized me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had not recognized the gentleman from South Carolina, because the gentleman from West Virginia moved to close debate.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman's time had expired, and he did not have the floor when I rose to address the Chair.

Mr. DAYTON (to Mr. ELLIOTT). Can we have an agreement that if you can have five minutes to close debate we can have three minutes on this side?

Mr. ELLIOTT. If my colleague can have five minutes, I will agree.

Mr. DAYTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I insist on my motion.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ELLIOTT) there were—ayes 77, noes 42.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, not a sufficient number voting therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the informal amendment will be withdrawn. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT], and the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ELLIOTT) there were—ayes 12, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Repairs and preservation at navy-yards and stations: For repairs and preservation at navy-yards and stations, $400,000.

Toward the construction of four timber dry docks, $200,000 each; in all, $800,000; said dry docks to be not less than 700 feet in length, and of other dimensions sufficient to meet the present and probable future requirements of the largest vessels of the Navy and auxiliary fleet. One of these docks to be located at the navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., to cost, when completed, not exceeding $825,000; one at the navy-yard, Boston, Mass., to cost, when completed, not exceeding $825,000; one at the navy-yard, League Island, Pa., to cost, when completed, not exceeding $825,000; and one at the navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal., to cost, when completed, not exceeding $825,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to give notice at this point that when we reach the next two paragraphs, providing for a dry dock at Algiers, La., and the third paragraph on page 27, providing for a survey for a dry dock at Galveston, I shall, if no one else does, make the point of order upon these provisions, for I think the public service does not require the construction, on the ground that the construction has not been authorized or commenced.

I give this notice now, so that the House may understand that, while I do not make the point of order on the paragraph which has just been read, I do it in simple fairness that the House may be in possession of my intention to make the point of order upon the remaining paragraphs, so that each member may act according to his own judgment.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANDY. If I understand the gentleman, his point of order will be aimed at all dry docks which it is proposed to establish anywhere on the Gulf coast.

Mr. CANNON. There is no naval station at either of these points on the Gulf coast. I merely give that notice.

Mr. ROBBINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "fleet," in line 9, page 26, strike out these words: "One of these docks to be located at the navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., to cost, when completed, not exceeding $825,000."

Mr. DOCKERY. Has the point of order been reserved?

Mr. CANNON. Gentlemen may have been misled; they may have thought that I reserved the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] has offered an amendment and desires to speak on it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to reserve a point of order against Portsmouth, before any discussion is had.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] reserves a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOPKINS. And the original text.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late to make any point of order upon the original text, after an amendment has been offered and accepted. He will be regarded as reserving the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, when the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine] was explaining this bill at the opening of the general debate, I asked him to explain the necessity for a dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H., within less than 60 miles of another dry dock, that at Boston. He stated that he would make the explanation under the five-minute rule. I desired him to explain the necessity for the expenditure of the large sum of money proposed in this bill (which we are told is only an appropriation looking toward the construction of this immense dock, presumably to be followed in years to come by appropriations of much larger sums) for a dry dock at Portsmouth, within this close proximity to Boston, where the Government has now a large navy-yard and an immense dry dock. These docks are too close together. As I have said, we were promised an explanation by the gentleman from Maine under the five-minute debate. It is not necessary that we have so many dry docks at one part of our coast. Our great war ships are built to sail the high seas; not to lie in dry docks.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to say in regard to the dock at Boston that it is the smallest dock in the country.

Mr. ROBBINS. Very well; they are building a large one there.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not saying anything against the dry dock at Boston. I challenge the attention of the Committee of the Whole to this fact, that we ought not to be carried off our feet in making expenditures for dry docks because we are approaching, in all probability, a foreign war. None of the money appropriated in this bill will be available unless in case of great emergency until after the 30th of next June; and these new dry docks proposed in this bill can not be constructed and completed for years to come. So that we ought to consider carefully this appropriation for a dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H. Is it necessary? Is it properly located?

Some time ago there was a board appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to locate dry docks on the coast of the United States. The report of that board, filed last August, and approved by the Secretary of the Navy, states just where dry docks ought to be established. It recommends that the Atlantic coast of the United States be divided into certain strategic districts for naval defense, as follows: The first one of them extending from the Bay of Fundy to Cape Cod; the second from Cape Cod to Sandy Hook; the third from Sandy Hook to Cape Henry; the fourth from Cape Henry to Cape Sable; the fifth, the coast line bordering on the Gulf of Mexico; the sixth, the southern portion of the Pacific coast, and the seventh, the northern portion.

Mr. Chairman, this naval board, acting under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, has divided the coast into these districts, designating where navy-yards and dry docks should be located. They also report as to points where dry docks "are urgently necessary," Boston, Norfolk, New York City, Port Royal, New Orleans, and Mare Island. But there is no report made in favor of a dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H. If we follow up this report we find it provides as follows:

The board in its summary recommends as sites for "docks urgently necessary" Boston, New York, Norfolk, Port Royal, New Orleans, and Mare Island. The ground on which they proceeded in this recommendation appears in the following quotation from their report:

"Acts of Congress have repeatedly required that navy-yards, and dry docks, their most essential and costly structures, shall be located with due regard to the commercial as well as the naval interests, and commissions have been from time to time appointed to select such sites. The reports of these commissions have furnished the board valuable information in the discharge of its duties. In its instructions to these commissions the Navy Department has formulated the special requirements of a site for a navy-yard to be—

"1. A situation upon a good harbor of sufficient size, depth, and accessibility for vessels of the largest size and heaviest draft.

"2. A favorable position with respect to the principal lines of defense.

"3. A local security from water attack due to position and natural surroundings.

"4. Ample water frontage of sufficient depth and permanence, and with currents of moderate rapidity.

"5. A favorable position with respect to the lines of interior communication (by rail or otherwise) with the principal sources of supply.

"6. That the character of the ground shall be suitable for the construction of excavated docks and basins and for heavy structures.

"7. Proximity to centers of labor and supplies of material.

"8. Healthiness of the climate and its suitability for outdoor labor.

"9. The existence in the vicinity of an ample supply of good potable water."

We find this board declares that Portsmouth is not available as a location for a dry dock. On this point they say explicitly:

That while, on account of its lack of some of the enumerated requisites, the board does not include Portsmouth, N. H., in its list of recommendations, yet in view of the fact that its otherwise well-equipped yard has no dock at all except a worn-out floating wooden dock built in 1851, so far worthless that its lifting capacity is reported to be only 1,500 tons, a dock should be built there commensurate with the use of the yard. If there is a navy-yard, there should be a dock.

Now, why should this Congress assume a wisdom that neither the Secretary of the Navy nor his expert board from the Navy Department undertake to assume? Why should we undertake to place a dry dock at Portsmouth when these expert authorities say emphatically that the location "lacks the requisites" for the proper operation and maintenance of a dry dock?

I can understand why we ought to have a dry dock at Boston, Mass.; because we have always had a navy-yard there. That is one of the districts that the Secretary of the Navy and his naval board have designated on the Atlantic coast as a proper location for a dry dock. I can understand why a dry dock is necessary at New York City; because of the large navy-yard at Brooklyn and the vast commercial interests of the port. I can understand why one fresh-water station in the country is necessary in order to keep the hulls of our steel battle ships clean by laying them up while out of commission in a fresh-water basin, and as League Island is the only fresh-water reserve basin, and the only navy-yard on fresh water, it is necessary to have a dry dock there.

There is great necessity for a large dry dock at Norfolk on account of the splendid harbor, always free from ice and snow, and capable of receiving at all times the largest ships. There should be proper docking facilities on the Gulf of Mexico, and this board have recommended New Orleans. This board also ask for a dock for the Pacific squadron at Mare Island, Cal., in addition to the dock we already have at Puget Sound, and I am content to follow their suggestions in all these. They are the experts of this case. Their recommendations have been adopted by the Secretary of the Navy, and, in my judgment, it would be a safe rule for us to adopt them also.

But, Mr. Chairman, not a single reason that applies to locating a dry dock at League Island, a dry dock at Norfolk, and one on the Gulf, and one new dry dock on the Pacific coast, applies in the case of Portsmouth, N. H. There in a frozen harbor, "lacking the enumerated requisites," against the recommendation of the board, it is proposed to spend $825,000. Let us save this sum of $800,000 that is to be applied merely, as the bill says, toward the construction of this dry dock. We are at present in the face of a grave crisis. A hostile fleet approaches our shores; our Naval Militia, as we have heard this morning in the debate on this very bill, is unequipped.

The great body of the National Guard of the United States, the reserve force upon which we must draw if we are to answer the call of humanity and go forth to liberate Cuba, are many of them without modern arms and without clothing to bear the heat and burden of this conflict. No word of mine shall hinder or delay the passage of this bill. This measure is the usual appropriation bill; it takes effect at the close of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June next. What we most want is to guard the money in our Treasury now that it be not expended in a useless venture, but be available for the national defense when needed. It will require men and money and warships to meet the coming crisis. Cuba must be free. We have asserted our guardianship of this hemisphere. We have said to all the world, "You shall not interfere in the affairs between Spain and Cuba."

While we have occupied this position, over 200,000 helpless women, old men, and children, all noncombatants and peaceful, have been deliberately starved to death on the island, and half a million more are in immediate danger of starvation. We can not escape our responsibility. This condition of affairs has excited the indignation of our people, intruded itself into our very lives, unsettled business, and aroused our people until public sentiment demands action, and action at once. And then, sir, we will be better off with one less dry dock and $800,000 more in our Treasury with which to fight Spain and carry liberty and bread to Cuban patriots.

Suffering humanity appeals to us for relief. Patriots fighting as our forefathers fought for freedom cry to us for help, and, sir, it is the duty of this great nation to hear and answer these calls. We go upon no war of conquest, but we should go bearing alms in our hands for the starving and guns on our shoulders for their Spanish oppressors. And when the work for humanity, this mission of mercy, is finished, if we have money left we can build this and other dry docks that the Navy Department does not recommend.

Let us, I say, take this $800,000 and apply it in this case of emergency to something that will defend the national honor and carry to those who expect from us help and relief that help and relief which they have a right to receive.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. With pleasure.

Mr. DOCKERY. If I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it seems that not only is a hostile fleet approaching this country, but some hostile movement is to be made or is now being made against the Treasury.

Mr. ROBBINS. It looks like it in this item.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman's seat is so far around to the side of the House that I am not quite sure that I caught correctly the reading of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, but if I did, I understand the Secretary of the Navy in express terms to disapprove of this proposition for a dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is that a correct understanding?

Mr. ROBBINS. The board disapproved it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENTZ. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes, in order that he may answer these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Ohio that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am much obliged to the committee.

In reply to the question that was asked me by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], I will say that the Secretary of the Navy referred this whole matter of dry docks to a board of naval officers, presumed to be experts, to make a report on it. They made a report last August, which was published in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, and that board reported explicitly, giving a list of requisites that were necessary to a place where a dry dock should be located—namely, abundance of water, nearness to the supply of labor, that it should be at a navy-yard already established, and convenient for the repair of ships—and on account of the lack of some of these enumerated requisites the board does not include Portsmouth, N. H., in its list of recommendations. It goes on to say that there is a navy-yard there and that it would be well to have a dock, but it says that it does not include it among the docks that it does ask for.

And that is what I ask the gentlemen of this committee to consider. That is the point to which I direct your attention—that they name the dry docks already retained in this bill, the construction of dry docks at Boston, New York, Norfolk, Port Royal, New Orleans, League Island, and Mare Island, and they explicitly say that Portsmouth, N. H., has not the requisites that these other places have, and they do not recommend a dry dock there.

Now, I want the committee to understand my objection to this. The objection that I make to it is that it is a useless piece of extravagance. A dry dock is a very expensive improvement to the Navy. We have witnessed a scandal about the dry dock at Brooklyn, where hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended upon a dry dock that turns out, the first time that a battle ship is placed in it, to be utterly useless and worthless.

It is true that is no reason why we should not construct other dry docks; but I say let us take this fabulous sum of money, $800,000, that we propose to expend at a place where the naval board do not recommend that a dry dock ought to be constructed—let us take that money and apply it to something in keeping with the extraordinary circumstances and conditions that confront the country.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Will the gentleman be kind enough to point out where the board disapproves of a dry dock at Portsmouth?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have not time to refer to that again. Let us finish the ships on our docks. Let us buy armor plate for them and put them in commission for use in the naval defense. Let us go abroad, if necessary, because we have been stinting our ships and refusing to finish them, and buy armor for them. Let us go abroad and purchase other ships for the existing emergency. Let us raise armies. Let us at this time, gentlemen of the committee, expend this $800,000 in a way that will show that the United States, in the presence of a crisis, understands the emergency confronting it and is determined to meet it to the fullest protection of our national honor. Mr. Chairman, I want this item stricken out for the reason that I believe it is a useless piece of extravagance, and for no other reason.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the course of the ten minutes accorded by the committee, omitted to give the citation for the remarkable statement that he made, that a committee of naval officers had absolutely disapproved of the building of a dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H.——

Mr. ROBBINS. I have just read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I hope the gentleman will please cite it. He stated very emphatically——

Mr. ROBBINS. Page 14 of the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1897.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And you cite that as a basis for what part of your remarks?

Mr. ROBBINS. That this dry dock is not desirable. I cited first, on page 13, what they did recommend, and then I cited page 14, where the board in their report, which the present Secretary of the Navy adopts, explicitly states that Portsmouth is not included as a place for a dry dock, because it lacks some of the enumerated requisites.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Of what?

Mr. ROBBINS. Of the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1897.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. And what did you find there?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have read it to you.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The RECORD will show to-morrow, but that will be too late. Did I or did I not understand the gentleman to say very emphatically that somebody, somewhere, representing the Navy Department or the Navy, had disapproved of the building of a dry dock at Portsmouth?

Mr. ROBBINS. Here is what I did say, just what the report says.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Oh, no; I understood you to make a statement——

Mr. ROBBINS. That is what I said, what the report says.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Do you now say that either the Secretary of the Navy, or any naval board, sitting on this subject, has ever disapproved of the building of a dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H.?

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I quoted the language, and that is all I have got to say about it. Let the board speak for itself.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will relieve the gentleman from any further embarrassment.

Mr. ROBBINS. It was just what I read.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am very sorry the gentleman's memory is so poor. Josh Billings said a great many very apt things, and I do not know of anything that he ever said that I thought so valuable as the suggestion that "it's a great deal better not to know so many things than it is to know so many things that ain't so." Now, if a naval board ever reported that there ought not to be a dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H., I never have discovered it. I do not find it in the report of the board that I hold in my hand.

If the Secretary of the Navy, at any time or anywhere, has disapproved of providing the Portsmouth Navy-Yard with a dry dock, I never have heard it and have had no reason to believe anything of the kind. As a matter of fact, I will preface my further remark with the statement that if the gentleman has flattered himself that he is touching any point that is particularly sensitive to me——

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, no; I do not think that.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Because this dry dock of the navy-yard happens to be located adjoining the border of my State, he not only makes a great mistake of fact, but a great mistake in the person.

Mr. ROBBINS. I utterly disclaim any intention of being personal.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The Secretary of the Navy——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Maine yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I desire to make my statement without being interrupted. The gentleman understands perfectly well that certain statements have been made, and I have been asked to furnish information in reply, and I say now I ought to have the opportunity to do that. I decline to yield. In the first place, the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H., is one of the oldest naval stations in the United States. We have invested there millions of dollars in machine shops and other facilities for the building and repair of ships. There is no dry dock there that is worthy of the name at this stage of naval construction. There is an old balance dock that is practically useless.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman from Maine permit a question? It is with reference to this bill. You say we have invested millions of dollars in machine shops there. Do you mean that the Government has?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The Government has.

Mr. LENTZ. Millions of dollars?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Why, unquestionably. Here is one of the oldest navy-yards in the United States. What is the point of the gentleman's question?

Mr. LENTZ. I wanted the information; that is all. I wanted to know whether you meant that the Government or the people who were in the business of building ships had this money invested there?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Recognizing the gentleman's manifest need of information, I am very glad to furnish it. [Laughter.] Now, in the first place, the Bunce board, which was organized to make a report on desirable places for the location of dry docks——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes; I will. I am satisfied from the gentleman's appearance that he needs the information.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Naval Committee if the Department has ever recommended that there should be a dry dock built at that place?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Now, if the gentleman will hold his breath just one minute and a quarter, I will answer him. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Let me answer the question. Here it is right here.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. How about holding your breath? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. On page 14.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will insist on order before he listens even to a parliamentary inquiry. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Kansas rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine, in interrupting the gentleman from Missouri, made it a point that he should hold his breath a minute and a half. [Laughter.] Now, I want to know if he is supposed to hold his breath during this time the Chair is trying to get order? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Owing to the leniency of the Chair, that time would be excluded from the time that the gentleman is to hold his breath. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Now, Mr. Chairman, what the French fellow-citizens of my friend from Medicine Lodge would call the entente cordiale having been restored, I will state on page 14 of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania cites as the basis of his contention that the Navy Department does not approve of a dry dock at Portsmouth, there is this reference to it:

That while, on account of its lack of some of the enumerated requisites—

That is based on the statement of the Bunce board, in which we do not agree—

the board does not include Portsmouth, N. H., in its list of recommendations, yet in view of the fact that its otherwise well-equipped yard has no dock at all, except a worn-out, floating wooden dock built in 1851, so far worthless that its lifting capacity is reported to be only 1,500 tons, a dock should be built there commensurate with the use of the yard. If there is a navy yard, there should be a dock.

I hope the questions of both gentlemen have been answered. In addition to that, I might say that a bill drawn by the Navy Department at the request of a distinguished member of another body, that incorporated that recommendation and desire there in regard to dry docks, was introduced in the Senate and subsequently introduced here, I think, by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER], which enumerates and specifies the amounts that the Department desire to be appropriated and expended for dry docks; and that bill included a paragraph providing a dry dock at Portsmouth, precisely as has been inserted in this bill.

I do not think it ought to be necessary to say that there is nothing in the suggestion that Boston is not very far away from Portsmouth. Why, every great naval power in the world has five to seven, sometimes a dozen, docks at one naval station. In this very bill we are providing for two great dry docks for the navy-yard at League Island. We have there to-day a dock large enough to take in any ship of the United States save the larger battle ships, and in this bill provision is made for one capable of taking the largest battle ships that may ever be built, and our action in the committee has not been to look at this matter through local spectacles or personal prejudice, but because we recognized the appropriateness of the place.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I should like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine desires that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. We have located one at League Island, because we have there the only station on the Atlantic coast which is located in fresh water, a great desideratum in a navy-yard, especially in these days of steel ships. We are building there, and we have made a liberal appropriation for dredging out at this place a great reserve basin, where when the war clouds shall have swept over and peace has settled over our land and this world, we can put in reserve, at a very small expense, under the care of skillful men, a large portion of the costly ships that are making our Navy so expensive in time of war or threatened war. Therefore we have provided a second dock for the navy-yard, in which to retire these vessels when we send them up to be put in reservation in this basin of fresh water.

That is all I desire to say in regard to the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, except that it is unrivaled in depth of water, and has every requisite that we could think of for a desirable naval station, and located in a country where shipbuilding has long been a principal art and industry of the people. The Portsmouth Navy-Yard and the Boston Navy-Yard, as is known to everyone who has ever studied the coast line of this country as related to naval warfare, are nearest the probable location of naval collision with a foreign power on the Atlantic. That is all I desire now to say.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If the gentleman asks questions, I must talk.

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. What is the draft of water at Portsmouth?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. You not only look so funny, but you talk so funny that you take all the wind out of my sails. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. What is the draft of water?

Mr. SULLOWAY. It is never less than 60 feet.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This gentleman can wade there without getting out of his depth. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON of Kansas. That was not so funny, after all.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois to offer a substitute for the paragraph in my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment as a substitute for the paragraph, and will be glad to be recognized after the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the House will give attention to the reading of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 23, lines 4 to 19, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Toward the construction of three timber dry docks, to be located at such navy-yards as the Secretary of the Navy may indicate, $300,000 each; each dock to be not less than 700 feet in length, and of other dimensions sufficient to meet the present and probable future requirements of the largest vessels in the Navy and auxiliary fleet, and each to be constructed under a contract, which is hereby authorized, not to exceed $825,000."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the committee for a brief time. I read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy of date November 15, 1897. Referring to the report of the board appointed by him, he says, on page 13:

The board, in its summary, recommends as sites for "docks urgently necessary" Boston, New York, Norfolk, Port Royal, New Orleans, and Mare Island.

That is the recommendation of the board appointed by Secretary Long. The Secretary further says, on page 14:

As the New England coast is our first exposure to European attack, there should certainly be such a dock upon it; and this site [Boston] is the one which meets all the requisites above quoted as essential or desirable, and which would be a source of considerable revenue to the Government from its commercial use. It is the center of the largest commercial and industrial activities in New England, is in the most favorable relation to coast defense, is close to a large body of mechanics of high skill and experience, and a new dock there has been repeatedly recommended in past years by the Bureau of Yards and Docks and other naval authorities.

Mr. Chairman, if the proposition to locate a dock at Portsmouth is agreed to, it will give to New England two dry docks, when one is ample for the public service.

Again, Mr. Chairman, referring to the proposed dock at Portsmouth—and the committee will note that it is not listed among the docks "urgently necessary"—the Secretary of the Navy said in November last that on account of its lack of some of the essential requisites, the board does not include Portsmouth, N. H., in its list of recommendations. In the same connection, it appears that the Secretary notes nine essential requisites for a dock which have already been read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Secretary says because Portsmouth lacks some of the essential requirements he does not include it among the list of docks recommended as urgently necessary.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman will find it on page 14.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have read it, have I not? I have not misquoted anything. As I have said, Mr. Chairman, so I repeat now, that the committee and the gentleman from Maine will not misunderstand: The Secretary of the Navy, an accomplished official, formerly a member of this House, recommended six sites for docks as "urgently necessary," and Portsmouth, N. H., was not on the list. The Secretary says on page 14 that he does not include it because it does not measure fully up to the requirements. He says, however, that if there is a navy-yard maintained there, it should be provided with a dock, but the dock is not listed among those "urgently necessary."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Where does he say that? He says no such thing in this volume.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Secretary enumerates on page 13 the docks urgently recommended, and further declares on page 14 that this navy-yard should have a dock, but it is not enumerated in the list of those "urgently necessary." I want my friend to understand that, because I do not desire to misquote the Secretary of the Navy or put the gentleman from Maine in a false position.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. You inadvertently did just now.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will state the facts again so that the gentleman will understand them. The Secretary named six places for docks in his opinion urgently necessary. He also recommends an additional one at Portsmouth, N. H., if a navy-yard is to be maintained there, but among the list enumerated as urgently necessary he does not include Portsmouth.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman had better read it again.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does not the gentleman from Maine understand it?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I can understand it when I read it as well as I can by the gentleman's yelling it.

Mr. LENTZ. They all understand it except the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will read it again. The list is Boston, New York, Norfolk, Port Royal, New Orleans, and Mare Island. Nowhere in that list of docks "urgently necessary" appears the name of Portsmouth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman have five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of strengthening the power of the United States on the seas. I am in favor of building up our Navy just as rapidly as can be done consistently with progressive naval architecture and the condition of the Treasury. I desire to go forward and accomplish that result, and I know that docks are necessary. I trust, however, that with the present emergency confronting us this House will not vote to take from the Treasury $850,000 of the people's money for a dock not recommended by the Secretary of the Navy as "urgently necessary."

I desire to provide first for the docks he recommends as urgently needed. I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will fully meet the demands of our present necessities and that the able Secretary of the Navy should have the discretion to locate the docks where required by the public interest. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment, because I believe it is in the interest of the naval service.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman from Maine for a moment.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I will reply very briefly to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], because this involves a little question of accuracy. I never abused the confidence of this House to my knowledge, I never made a statement on the floor of this House that I did not expect every man within the reach of my voice to believe was made in good faith. And when I questioned the accuracy of the statement of the gentleman from Missouri, it was done upon what I supposed was a reasonable knowledge of the literature upon this subject.

I cited the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy—that and nothing else. The gentleman from Missouri rises and comments upon that and attempts to parry the effect of the Secretary's direct recommendation that a dry dock should be built at Portsmouth by stating that in another portion of his report—I am making this statement with great care now—if I misstate the gentleman, I want him to correct me right here—the gentleman read on another page what he said was a report of the Secretary of the Navy in which the Secretary enumerated certain docks as absolutely necessary, the Portsmouth dock not being among them.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is correct.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It is not correct; it is absolute misinformation. It may be true that I have repeated the gentleman's statement correctly, if that is what he means to say; but he has been absolutely misinformed or has misread——

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me say that I read from the Secretary's report, page 13.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I know exactly what the gentleman read from; and if I have stated correctly the gravamen of the gentleman's remarks, he misinformed the House—unintentionally, I have no doubt.

On page 13 of the Secretary's report he does not enumerate certain dry docks as urgently necessary in his opinion, but says this—and if there is any gentleman here who can not understand this language at the first reading, I hope he will get the report and study it—the Secretary says, on page 13:

The board—

The board is not the Secretary; the board is the Bunce board, which made the report. He says:

The board in its summary recommends——

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the way I read it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes; but you did not so state it, and the House did not get that impression. The Secretary says:

The board in its summary recommends sites for "dry docks urgently necessary"—

"Dry docks urgently necessary" being quoted. That is what the board recommended. But the Secretary appointed the board to advise the Department as to its action; and upon a revision of the report of the board the Secretary, giving his judgment upon that report, on page 14 says that he recommends the construction of a dock at Portsmouth, N. H., and he gives his reasons therefor. That is all I want to say.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not dissent from the gentleman's statement; that is the way I read it

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the indulgence of the Committee of the Whole upon this subject. I want to discuss these dry docks in connection very briefly with the battle ships, and I would be glad to have ten or fifteen minutes, if I should desire that much time. I intend to speak to the bill, and nothing else.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I believe it to be the desire at heart of every member of this committee in the present emergency to provide to the best advantage for the public service, and from that standpoint I am going to talk about this appropriation for the docks, and also incidentally, a little later on, when we reach that subject, about the appropriation for the battle ships.

We have plenty of docks in the United States to dock all our vessels except the first-class battle ships. I think there is no dispute upon that point. The first-class battle ships, few in number, can not be docked anywhere in the United States, except at New York; at Hunters Point, in San Francisco Bay; on Puget Sound, and at Port Royal—four points in all.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. They can not dock a battle ship at San Francisco Bay.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir; they can dock a battle ship at San Francisco Bay, as I will show in a few minutes.

Mr. HILBORN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that a battle ship can be docked at Hunters Point?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes, sir. The Oregon was docked at Hunters Point.

Mr. HILBORN. But she was docked before her guns and armor were on.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. But I will just close this matter right now by reading a telegram from the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to myself:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, March 24.

Hunters Point dry dock will take battle ships only when lightened up to 23 feet draft.

[Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!"]

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. That is exactly what my colleague on the committee stated.

Mr. CANNON. Will gentlemen be good enough to hear me read this through and then comment on it? This is a question of fact that we can not afford to differ about if we can find out what the fact is.

The Union Iron Works dry dock is not of sufficient size for battle ships. Will accommodate monitors as large as the Amphitrite and protected cruisers as large as the Atlanta.

JOHN D. LONG.

Yesterday morning—and now I ask the attention of my friend from California [Mr. HILBORN]—I went down and had an interview with Commander Endicott, of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, a very intelligent official, and I asked him what was meant when it was said in the telegram that Hunters Point would only take battle ships when they were lightened up to 23 feet draft. He said: "I mean that the Oregon was docked at Hunters Point, and can be again with safety and facility if the coal is taken out of her bunkers." Said I, "Without taking off the guns?" "Yes," said he, "if the coal is taken out of her bunkers." "Well," said I, "are you in the habit of docking battle ships with the bunkers full of coal?" He said he thought not. Now, so much for the question of fact.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Let me ask my friend right there if the dock which he refers to is owned by the Government?

Mr. CANNON. No; I understand not.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Are there any shops there?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the second or third best shipbuilding plant on earth.

Mr. HILBORN. How far is that from Hunters Point?

Mr. CANNON. Hunters Point is on San Francisco Bay, with plenty of water to get into it, and so is the Union Iron Works.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I thought you were referring to another Hunters Point.

Mr. CANNON. No; Hunters Point, Calfornia, with full depth of water. Now, I want to say further that there is only one battle ship, I believe, upon the Pacific coast, or contemplated to be upon the Pacific coast in the immediate future. Am I corrrect about that?

Mr. SOUTHARD. No.

Mr. CANNON. How many more than one?

Mr. SOUTHARD. This bill provides for the building of another.

Mr. CANNON. No; I am speaking of those ready for action. The Oregon, I believe, has left, and we have got two docks there that can take the Oregon, one on the Sound and the other at Hunters Point. Now, I am speaking about immediate use.

Now, let me go a step further. New York has a dock, about to be completed, that will take these battle ships, to be done by the 1st of April. Port Royal, if we had a sufficient number of water——

A MEMBER. A sufficient depth of water.

Mr. CANNON. A sufficient depth of water, or a sufficient number of water, as a constituent out in Illinois calls it. If we had a sufficient depth of water, that would be a good dock. Now, I had a little more conversation with Commander Endicott. I said to him, "In these times of emergency, Commander, suppose you had a dry dock that would take in the largest battle ship at Mare Island Navy-Yard, could you dock it?" Said he, "No; I could not, with safety."

If there was a dry dock at Mare Island Navy-Yard which would take the Oregon or a first-class battle ship, it is in substantially the same condition that Port Royal would be. We dare not go into it. I am talking now about what Commander Endicott said. "Well," said I, "what is the matter? We have got a navy-yard at Mare Island?" Remember, I am now quoting Commander Endicott, of the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Mr. HILBORN. Did you ask him if there was not 30 feet of water in front of the yard there now, made by the dredging that is going on?

Mr. CANNON. Suppose there were a thousand feet of water in front of the yard, if there is only 20 feet of water leading up to it. How are you going to get over that 20 feet?

Mr. HOPKINS. Jump. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Somebody says "jump." Well, now——

Mr. HILBORN. Why will not the gentleman be fair? The gentleman knows, I suppose, that there is a shallow place of about 2 miles, where it will cost about a couple of hundred thousand dollars to get 30 feet of water. He knows also that the pilots of San Francisco take ships over that shoal, ships drawing 28 feet of water at mean tide. Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. CANNON. I know this, that——

Mr. HILBORN. The gentleman knows that there is a space between the Golden Gate and Mare Island Navy-Yard—a space of over 28 miles—and that there is a little shoaling over perhaps 2 miles; but even that is not serious enough to interfere with the commerce of that port. It is on the line of the great inland commerce of the State, and all of these great wheat ships that go over there have never found the bottom. Ships of 28 feet draft go over there every day, and any battle ship that we have got could go from the Golden Gate to the Mare Island Navy-Yard to-day, including the Oregon.

Mr. CANNON. I will have to ask to have the courtesy of the House a little later on, to extend my time.

Mr. HILBORN. Certainly; but I did not want this to go unchallenged. The Oregon was built in San Francisco. She was ordered to go to Mare Island, and Mr. Scott, the builder, as he stated before our committee the other day, was willing to dock her there, but as there was some shoaling near Mare Island, which has since been removed, the Department declined to have her go there; but Mr. Scott says now that she can go there, and she can.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I want to say to my friend that I have as much pride in the service of my country and in all its navy-yards and in all its harbors as anybody. I am making no attack upon the gentleman or upon his navy-yard, except as the navy-yard is now connected with the well-being and service of my country. I am only seeking to tell the truth about it.

I say again that Commander Endicott, of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, told me no longer ago than yesterday that neither he nor any other officer dared take a battle ship to Mare Island.

Why, I hold in my hand the report of the Chief of Engineers. He says it will take $318,950 to dredge the channel 800 feet wide, to get up to the navy-yard from San Francisco Bay. It has not been dredged. It has filled up as you have improved the land. In the rainy season the water descends and the sediment fills it up. You have got to dredge it and keep dredging it. Now, my point is this: For three years to come if a battle ship is docked in San Francisco Bay it must be docked in the Hunters Point dry dock, where the Oregon was docked, and where she can be docked again if you take the coal out of her bunkers.

Mr. HILBORN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question? Does he not know that since then the Oregon has had her bilge-keels put on and that she can not get into that dock at all?

Mr. CANNON. Commander Endicott says she can. That is my authority. Commander Endicott says she can; and if she can not be docked at the Hunters Point dry dock, she can not be docked anywhere in San Francisco Bay for three years to come.

Mr. HILBORN. Is Endicott a civil engineer or a naval officer?

Mr. CANNON. A naval officer of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. This conversation was had with him yesterday.

Mr. TATE. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CANNON. I should like to go on a little longer.

Mr. TATE. I should like to make one suggestion. In a letter dated March 23 John M. Wilson, brigadier-general, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, makes the following statement in reference to the depth of the channel at Mare Island:

> The latest charts on file show a possible channel of 16½ feet depth at the average of the lower low waters from Mare Island Navy-Yard through Mare Island Strait to San Pablo Bay, and a channel thence to San Francisco Bay with a least depth of 3¾ fathoms (22½ feet) at the mean of the lowest low water of each twenty-four hours.

Mr. CANNON. I have stated my information. Here is the report of the Chief of Engineers. In my committee room there is a Coast Survey chart.

Now, I am proud of Mare Island Navy-Yard. I am proud of Boston Navy-Yard. I am proud of the New York Navy-Yard, the League Island Navy-Yard, and the Norfolk Navy-Yard; but notwithstanding that fact, is it good economy now to come in here and provide for the building of five dry docks that can not be constructed short of two or three years' time? Is that good economy? It costs $850,000 apiece to build them.

Now, if I had my way about it, I would take the provision and move, as an amendment, three timber dry docks located at points to be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy. This is no time for controversy about localities. It is a time for efficient service and for action that will bring us the best service in the least time.

Now, I want to call your attention to one other thing. I hold in my hand a letter from Judge Payson, our former colleague in this House. This letter is written by him as the attorney for the Newport News Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company, which he claims is the greatest shipbuilding plant on earth, and in which letter he says, as attorney for that company, that ground is to be broken within two or three days for a dry dock 1,140 feet long and 90 feet in breadth, which will at one and the same time take the two greatest battle ships not only constructed, but that are talked about being constructed; that that dock will be done within twelve months from this day. Well, now, there is relief in sight. I will put this letter in the RECORD. It is as follows:

1229 MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1898.

DEAR MR. CANNON: Referring to your inquiry as to the construction of a new dry dock at the shipyard of the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company at Newport News, Va., I have the honor to state:

First. Details of plans are now being perfected so that excavation will be begun in a few days now. The dry dock will be 1,140 feet long, 90 feet wide at bottom, taking a ship of 95 feet beam, with a middle gate, thus taking in two vessels at one time if necessary, and costing approximately $1,000,000.

The size of the dock accommodating at one time any two of the largest battle ships in the world.

The depth of water over the sill will be 30 feet.

The dock will be completed within one year from this date. Its construction will be pushed with the energy characteristic of this yard.

I show you with this, a blue print of the preliminary plans of the new dry dock, as well as existing dry docks, all located practically in the center of the shipyard, with shops of all kinds close at hand, complete to-day with the largest and most improved machinery known to shipbuilding.

This company has at this time the most extensive and best modern shipbuilding and ship-repairing plant in the world, and will enlarge and improve upon what it has in connection with the new dry dock. As illustrating, work is approaching completion upon a new hoisting crane, with a capacity of 150 tons, to be located below the old dry dock and at a wharf near the proposed dry dock, for utilization with it.

The wharfage facilities of this company are abundant, as shown by the blue print, and will accommodate any ships afloat or contemplated in the world.

This company recognizes the necessity of such a dry dock within the United States and on the Atlantic coast, that this nation shall not depend upon the courtesy of a foreign nation when dockage of our large cruisers and battle ships is necessary for any purpose.

The harbor of Newport News is one of the best in the Union, and it is the intention of the officers of this company to put its works and yard in condition to propose to the Government to do any character of work or repairs with the utmost expedition, and by a large percentage more economically than the same can be done at any Government yard.

For extensive repairs upon cruisers or battle ships the advantage of having a very large force of skilled mechanics ready for immediate work is apparent, as is also the ready availability of the immense plant and machinery which this company has and will maintain.

Moreover, it is ready and willing to enter into a contract with the Government, giving its work immediate preference and treating any contract as one of urgency when desired by the Government, working day and night if desired in urgent cases.

Undoubtedly very much minor repairing should and will be done at the Government yards, but it is submitted to you that such advantages as can be offered by this company in its new dock, shops, and yards and appliances can not be hoped for, as to larger work upon the great ships in our Navy, in the national navy-yards.

The advantages which this company has, briefly alluded to above, will be placed at the disposal of the Government whenever it desires the use of any upon the most reasonable terms, and always at a large percentage less than the Government could provide for itself, and secure results at a great profit to itself over work done at its own yards.

This I am authorized to state for the company.

Yours, truly,

L. E. PAYSON,
Attorney for the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company.

Hon. J. G. CANNON.

P. S.—I hand you herewith a printed card showing details of the works of the company as they were in 1893. They have been considerably enlarged since.

Further than that, he states that that company stands ready to contract with the Government to do this work, touching this docking, for less than the Government can do it itself. Well, now, I am not here as the attorney for that shipbuilding company; but there is our earliest relief, and there is where, if we are entering upon a season of emergency, we can find construction of dry docks in one-third of the time they can be built by the provisions of this bill, without a dollar of cost to the United States Treasury, and that dock is going in, and the Government is not going to pay anything and does not have to appropriate anything. I say again the committee may authorize dry docks up to five or fifty, but that dock is going in, and I have thought proper to call attention to it.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. CANNON. It is the Newport News dock.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is that dock?

Mr. CANNON. A private dock.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What relation has it to the Government?

Mr. CANNON. None on earth, except that the dock will be there. It can be used in twelve months, and at a less cost to the Government than we could use the docks provided for in this bill if they were ready to-day. I am speaking of how we can best supply the emergency that is upon us.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is the compensation?

Mr. CANNON. I refer the gentleman to the letter.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I know all about the proposition. This is a proposition of a joint stock business, the Government going into partnership, to run a dry dock.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; it is not the floating steel-dock proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOW. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois may be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I would like ten.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Now I will ask for order, please.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RIDGELY. The bill as it is now provides for a dock at Mare Island, not exceeding $800,000, and according to your statement we have official information that it will take something near $300,000 to dredge the channel leading to it.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. That statement ought not to be made.

Mr. RIDGELY. And a perpetual expense to keep that channel open to it.

Mr. CANNON. My information is the dredging will have to continue.

Mr. HILBORN. There never has been a dollar expended in keeping that channel open.

Mr. CANNON. Has the channel filled up?

Mr. HILBORN. I do not know.

Mr. CANNON. Do not you want it dredged?

Mr. HILBORN. Yes; so as to enable it to take in battle ships. There never has been a dollar expended on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. Let us have some semblance of order at least, if it does not last.

Mr. CANNON. If we will all keep our heads, we can talk about this matter from a business standpoint. I have no place to urge, nor have I any place to discriminate against in the location of these docks. I am trying to find what is the best interest of the public service. Now, having said that, I would state that I should be willing to build two docks at New York if the service indicated the need, and two at Boston if the service indicated them, another at League Island if the service indicated it, and another on the Sound and at San Francisco if the service indicated it; but you must remember a dry dock means a navy-yard. You have got to have the machinery.

A little later on I shall make a point of order against Algiers, opposite New Orleans, because there is no machinery, no navy-yard. A little later on I will make a point of order against Galveston, because there is no machinery; and this is not a time to establish additional navy-yards in the present condition of the country. For twenty-five years we have been trying to get away from navy-yards, and keeping them only for repairs. We have been minimizing navy-yards, and by following that policy there have been built up at Philadelphia, at Union Iron Works, San Francisco, at Wilmington, and at Newport News shipbuilding yards equal to the best on earth, by private enterprise, in all of which the Government can and does get its work done, in construction, 20 and 25 per cent cheaper than it can do it in its own navy-yards.

I believe in that policy. I want to hold fast to it. In this time of doubt, in this time of anxiety, in this time of emergency, I do not want anybody, taking advantage of the patriotic spirit of the country, to pass a bill making naval appropriations that in the name of providing for the present emergency looks out for construction of ships, navy-yards, or docks that will not be completed until three or four years from now, and has no more to do with the present emergency than I have with the emergencies that existed twenty years ago.

Now, what is there besides these navy-yards? Three battle ships, to cost, when complete, $5,000,000 apiece. Now, I want to say, touching the Committee on Naval Affairs, an able committee, presided over—and I take pleasure in saying it—by the gentleman from Maine, by profession in early life a sailor, a gallant naval officer of the late war, and having in my judgment as much technical knowledge touching these matters as anybody in the House—substantially I indorse this bill.

It is a good bill. I want to say, however, when they propose to build these five dry docks, and when they propose to go a step further and build three battle ships that can not be built for three and four years to come before they go into commission, I say, in my judgment, that is seeking to take advantage of the present interested condition of the country, and in the name of emergency get legislation and appropriation that can not be gotten if it was not for the present emergency, and does not assist us in the present emergency.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Will my friend yield for one question? Of course I appreciate his kindly compliment. The gentleman is an old, experienced legislator, and flattery from him means a great deal to me. But I do not want him to defeat my bill or emasculate it under the guise of compliment. I want to ask my friend from Illinois if he thinks that leaving out of this bill the provision for immediately, or as immediately as possible, starting the construction of three additional ships for our line will give the country that additional protection any sooner than it will by putting them in and beginning them now? If it takes three years to build them, the sooner we begin, if we want them, the better. [Applause.] I hope my friend will pardon me one further word——

Mr. CANNON. I want to reply to the applause.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. You can not destroy that. The Democrats insist upon applauding me almost every time I get up. [Laughter.]

I want to say, as chairman of the committee, and for the committee itself, that we have had no suggestion from any source complaining of our granting too much in the way of new shipbuilding, but we have had lots of criticism that we did not provide for more. If we were to gauge the duty of the committee by the talk on this floor and in the other Chamber and what we read in the newspapers, we should have provided far more liberally than we did.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to begin where I left off. I commend the gentleman's bill. It authorizes the construction of torpedo boats, torpedo destroyers, and other vessels that are necessary for the Navy, and if we are to have early trouble, the most of them can be completed and used, possibly, before it will cease. I want to say to my friend, without criticising his bill, that it might properly include more of these boats that can be quickly constructed and brought into early action.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will move to amend by adding any number my friend will name.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I would move to strike out two of the battle ships and put in the equivalent in boats that will be ready to help us fight, if we have any fighting to do.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. You want to strike down the fighting line and put up a mosquito fleet. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I know, Mr. Chairman, it is a thankless job when the great patriotic heart of the country is stirred to its depths to stand and criticise or suggest anything touching what is labeled "national defense," even although the provision in no way contributes to that defense, but I have a duty to perform to myself and to the country, and whatever the result may be I will perform it as best I can.

Now, then, what does this bill do? In the three battle ships and in the dry docks it authorizes an expenditure of $20,000,000, in round numbers, including other contracts that are not appropriated for in this bill. I give it in round numbers, and $15,000,000 of that is for three battle ships which can not be placed in commission within thirty-six months from this time.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is the reason we want to start them now.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I listened with great interest to the gentleman from Maine when he discussed the merits of the battle ships and the monitors. I do not know much about it myself, but that very discussion threw much doubt over my mind, because I thought there was a doubt in his mind which was superior—the one wonderfully expensive and the other inexpensive.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not want a wrong impression to prevail. I placed myself absolutely behind the consensus of the best judgment of the most skillful experts of the combined navies of the world, and was modest in expressing my own opinion, although I concurred with them.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if this was something touching gentlemen's own private affairs, what would you do? You would say that the utility of the battle ship has not yet been demonstrated on the seas and the oceans of the world. You would say that perchance they are now about to be tried. Many people fear they may be, but I should be glad if, with honor and justice, they may not be; but many people believe they will be.

Now, as we can not build these three ships in time enough to use—it will be three years before they can be completed—I ask gentlemen, as practical business men, if it is not the best policy to spend our money touching such ships as we can bring shortly into action and let us see the battle ships tested before we bond the Government for $15,000,000 to build three more battle ships that may by the test of war be rendered obsolete before they can be completed? [Applause.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SOUTHARD. How soon can we build any battle ship or any other boat and have it ready for use?

Mr. CANNON. I am informed that it will be three years' working stress, if I may use that word, before a battle ship can be completed. Three years ago this month the Kentucky and Kearsarge were authorized, and they were launched on Thursday last, and can not be completed for use in a year from this time.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I said any boat.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. How soon could you get your naval defense ready—this broom brigade that you propose? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. We can get some of it in three, some in four, and some of it in six months. We can convert, and we are converting, various vessels, as the gentleman knows, for use in his broom brigade, or my broom brigade, if he chooses to call it so—many useful ships, our revenue cutters, and some of our light-house tenders are to be available.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Those are the vessels you do not want to authorize.

Mr. CANNON. I do want to authorize them. Everything that will properly equip my country, protect it in the immediate or present emergency, I want to see authorized; I want to see purchased. I want to see put in motion everything that is necessary to do it. This House, less than two weeks ago, in one short paragraph, appropriated $50,000,000 for that very purpose.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Yes; and the appropriation of $50,000,000 which we the other day placed at the disposal of the President of the United States was rendered necessary as to its leading purpose by the stress in which we found ourselves because we had failed to make such appropriations in time. And the President has been obliged to ransack the "bargain counters" of Europe to try to get something that we can put afloat under the American flag—something fit to meet aggression from the other side of the ocean. [Applause.]

If we are going to fight any nation of the world, we have got to meet the equipments of the world; and we can not do it with ferryboats and tugboats and yachts, as we did in 1861–1864.

Mr. HILBORN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question right in the same line.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to finish his remarks without limit as to time.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HILBORN] for a question; and then I will try to answer him and the gentleman from Maine together, if I can.

Mr. HILBORN. Does the gentleman know that we have scurried over the whole world to find a good battle ship, and that there is not a battle ship in the world for sale to-day—not one? We can buy all the gold that we want, but we can not buy a fighting ship in the whole world.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer the gentleman with great pleasure, because if I am not right in my views touching a proper policy, I want to get right.

The gentleman says we can not buy battle ships. That may be true. It may be true that three years ago we ought to have commenced building battle ships. But whether we made a mistake then or not is not the question. The question is, What shall we do now? That is the practical question. The gentleman from Maine says, "Build three battle ships, to be completed four years from now." What does the Secretary of the Navy say? He says, "Build one."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is not fair.

Mr. CANNON. That is his report.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is not fair.

Mr. CANNON. Well——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I appeal to my friend; that is not fair. That report of the Secretary of the Navy was made long before this war cloud had come over the horizon.

Mr. LENTZ. I rise to a point of order. A few minutes ago we extended the time of the gentleman from Illinois for the purpose of allowing him to finish his remarks, but not for the purpose of allowing half a dozen intervening speeches. I object to these interruptions.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will try to get along.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole will please come to order. Gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend from Maine that I take the report of the Secretary of the Navy, submitted to Congress under the law on the first Monday of last December. While we have had this trouble upon the country two years and over——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Will my friend please allow me to suggest right there——

Mr. CANNON. I am going to render your question unnecessary.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That since that time we have lost one of our battle ships, and the Secretary of the Navy has been pouring in requests to our committee ever since for increased appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. I am going to ask you a question, and if it embarrasses you, I will withdraw it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. All right.

Mr. CANNON. I am speaking now to the gentleman with the highest respect. Does my friend believe on his judgment and experience that it is wise and expedient to enter upon the building of battle ships at this time?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will answer the gentleman with absolute frankness and absolute promptness, that to-day, if my advice were asked regarding the best interests of this country as to naval expenditures, I would ask that the number of ships we have authorized be doubled. [Applause.]

And I would find my ample justification for that advice in the fact that to-day, while it is conceded that we can build in our own country, from American materials, by the strong right arms and with the skilled mechanism of our own workingmen, the finest, the fleetest, and the most powerful ships, and the most invulnerable armor in the world, we are humiliated by the spectacle that agents of the United States are to-day, as I have stated, ransacking Europe to buy inferior ships at an enormous price.

I want to see the work carried on here. I want the flag to be defended by American ships, built by American workmen, and manned by American sailors. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, I have read between the lines that this bill proposes—how many ships? Three battle ships. Why does it not carry six? Why does it not carry nine?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Because we were afraid you would organize and defeat us.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We all recognize the belligerent rights of the gentleman from Maine. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will not interrupt the gentleman from Illinois again.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Committee of the Whole kindly come to order? Will gentlemen be seated and refrain from conversation?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the gentleman from Maine and the committee that if in their opinion it was not wise to authorize the building of three battle ships last December that could not be completed for four years, much less is it wise to do so now, when we have the possibility or probability of immediate war upon our hands, which, if it comes, can not last until these battle ships are completed.

Mr. Chairman, this House and the Congress have not been laggard in making provision for the public defense. They are ready again when it is necessary, with the same unanimity heretofore exhibited, in my judgment, to make further provision.

Now, I make these remarks for what purpose? With any considerable hope that two of these three battle ships will be stricken out? No; not with any considerable hope. With any considerable hope that six would not go through? No. That nine or ten would not go through? No. But I make them for the purpose of showing to this House that it is not always the highest grade of patriotism that makes expenditure of money for any and all purposes.

Every dollar that is necessary, yes; but not to be flushed by those who, perchance, may desire contracts. [Applause.] And I am not now referring disrespectfully to any American citizen or any member of the House. My countrymen have a right to want contracts if they can get them. But if they do get them, when it is not to the best interest of the public service and for the national defense, through my action as a legislator, then it is my fault. That is the object of my remarks.

I have been in this House, first and last, for almost a quarter of a century. I have seen the tide ebb touching expenditures. I have seen much of investigation and much of inquiry, and much of criticism touching the expenditures that were made during that most wonderful of all wars, the late civil war, and for eight or ten years after its close. Many expenditures were made that were better to have been left unmade; but upon the whole it was a magnificent outcome.

I do not make these remarks here this afternoon with the desire in the slightest to dampen the ardor of any American citizen or anybody in the confines of our boundary, in Congress or out of Congress, but I make them for the purpose, if I can, of bringing the committee, with loyal hearts and cool heads, to consider these propositions from a business standpoint and to make those appropriations that will best care for the public defense in the present emergency and that will squander the least amount of money in the future, after our troubles are over. [Applause.]

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, any member of the Naval Committee who would seek to answer the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in the five minutes allotted to him must necessarily labor under serious disadvantages; but as a member of that committee I do not desire that these remarks shall pass wholly without observation from the members of that committee.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—and I say it kindly—has a weakness for finding fault with the appropriations that do not come from his own committee room, no matter how much or how little they may be; and I want to call attention further to the fact that while this House promptly voted to put $50,000,000 at the disposal of the President for the emergency which it was thought, and which the gentleman himself stated to us, threatened the country, yet this same gentleman springs up in opposition when the Naval Committee, in the discharge of a plain duty, asks that a few millions be appropriated to prevent such emergencies springing up before the country in the future. [Applause.]

It is not a wise policy, gentlemen, for us to be in that position where these emergencies can arise, and while a man may stand here and proclaim his patriotism, I want to say that the broader, the nobler, the greater patriotism of an American citizen is to provide liberally for the American defense, so that emergencies can not arise to make it necessary to scamper all over God's green earth, under a special appropriation, to buy the battle ships that can not be bought. [Applause.]

A nation looks at the future as an individual does, and we must lay our plans and we must have our policies; and it is a very strange thing for a great leader of a party in power to stand here, it seems to me, after having asked for a great emergency appropriation, to oppose a broad policy that would make every American citizen proud of the American Navy, proud of the fact that the American flag upon an American ship, protected by the wholesome fear of American power, can go in peace into any harbor in the world without the vessel that bears it being blown up and destroyed.

But, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this amendment proposes to meet the question of dry docks, I want to call attention to the weakness of the position that has been taken by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I want also to call attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to the fact that he has not, it seems to me, comprehended the care and the diligence and caution exercised by the Naval Committee in fixing these appropriations and in fixing the points where these dry docks are to be built.

He must remember that the Secretary of the Navy, under the Bunce board that was appointed to investigate this matter, suggests that there shall be built six dry docks in various portions of the country and that certain other repairs should be made, which would involve a total expenditure of $5,725,000; and, on the other hand, that that board and the Secretary of the Navy, too—for he has adopted it—have recommended that for adequate docking facilities in addition there should be built four or five more, the total cost of which would be $5,400,000.

Therefore, if we should follow out the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy, there would be a total expenditure of over $11,000,000 on this one item of dry docks, while the total expenditure authorized for the five docks carried in this bill is $4,250,000 only. This has been brought about, gentlemen of the committee, by the thorough examination of the Naval Committee, and the ascertainment by that committee that substantial, efficient wooden docks can be built at these five places at a considerably less cost, and the expenditure of a million and a half dollars less than recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine was recognized.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I yield to my colleague [Mr. HILBORN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to recognize the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY], if the gentleman from Maine does not desire to take the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I think I will meet the manifest wish of the House if I move to close debate on this paragraph and amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had agreed to recognize the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY].

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I should not desire to take him from the floor.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I should prefer a vote now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], to close debate on the paragraph and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 9, page 26, after the word "fleet," the following:

"One of these docks to be located at the navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., to cost, when completed, not exceeding $825,000."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOCKERY) there were—ayes 64, noes 107.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 26, strike out all of lines 4 to 19, inclusive, and insert:

"Toward the construction of three timber dry docks, to be located at such navy-yards as the Secretary of the Navy may indicate, $200,000 each, each dock to be not less than 700 feet in length, and of other dimensions sufficient to meet the present and probable future requirements of the largest vessels of the Navy and auxiliary fleet, and each to be constructed under a contract, which is hereby authorized, not to exceed $825,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I believe I will have a division—just a count.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 107.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The announcement of the result was received with applause.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, does that dispose of the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. That disposes of the paragraph.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 9378) and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE GALLERIES.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker is authorized by the rules to set apart different portions of the galleries for different purposes. One portion of the gallery has been set apart for the use of members and their families and visitors. The Chair is informed that the admission to these galleries has not been confined to the rule, as decided upon by the House.

On ordinary occasions perhaps it makes very little difference, but on occasions when it is expected that the galleries are likely to be filled, it causes great inconvenience, and the families of members are sometimes excluded. On conferring with the Doorkeeper, the Chair thought it wise that the accommodations should be somewhat enlarged, and also that the rules should be strictly carried out. The Chair thought he ought to say this to the House, so that if there was any objection to be made upon the subject, it could be made, because the Chair desires simply to satisfy the members of the House and their families and others entitled to these privileges.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I should like to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state it?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Does admission to the members' gallery mean merely the immediate family of the member or the political family of the member? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It does not mean the political family.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Does it mean that a Representative's secretary can not sit in the members' gallery?

The SPEAKER. Such is the understanding of the rule by the Chair—that it is for members' families and their visitors.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Where shall we put the member's secretary?

A MEMBER. Put him to work.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks perhaps the member's office might be one place. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Sometimes he knows more than the Representative.

The SPEAKER. Sometimes—well, no; the Chair can not agree to that.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to suggest——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires simply to carry out the wishes of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to suggest that while constituents happening to be here in the city might not be visitors within the meaning of the Chair's construction or within the rule, still they are here, and I take it no member of the House would want to be forced to carry a friend from his district into the other gallery. Yet, under that absolute interpretation, a member would not be permitted to carry a friend from his district who was visiting the Capitol into the members' gallery.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that it is the intention of the rule that a member in the gallery can not be accompanied by those he sees fit; but still that deprives other members' families to that extent. The Chair desires to say there are continually requests of such kind, that galleries set apart for other purposes should be opened, which is contrary to the rules of the House; and of course such requests are very difficult to meet. The Chair wanted members simply to understand, so that they could give preference as they pleased.

Mr. BAILEY. My understanding is, on special occasions the galleries are set apart and admission is by card—a very proper practice upon great occasions. And I only desire to say that I am very much inclined to think that the galleries ought to be opened. I have some doubt about reserving any part of the galleries of the House of Representatives for any particular people.

The SPEAKER. It may be——

Mr. BAILEY. But the rules of the House do reserve them.

The SPEAKER. The rules do reserve them.

Mr. BAILEY. And I am myself very much inclined to conform to the rules. But as the Chair was laying the matter before the House, I desire to say my judgment is, it is entirely proper for a member of this House to take into the members' gallery any friends whom he knows and who happen to come here from a distance. If he would be willing to take them into his home and introduce them to his family, he ought to be permitted to take them into the gallery.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. When they are visitors to Washington.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if I understand that on that side [the east side] the place reserved for members and their families has been enlarged?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. CUMMINGS. How much?

The SPEAKER. It has been doubled since I first came here.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then it runs out to that door?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I understand these three rows and these three rows over there [indicating] are for members and their families, and nobody else.

The SPEAKER. For visitors.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then these over there [on the west side]?

The SPEAKER. Those are reserved.

Mr. CUMMINGS. They are for the visitors, so that a member, if a constituent visits him, can give him a card which will admit him to that gallery.

The SPEAKER. The one on the left of the Chair, but not on the right of the Chair.

Mr. BAILEY. While this matter is up about the rules of the House, I want to say to the Chair that the Doorkeeper or somebody under him has taken the sofas from the Democratic side of the House, and taken all but one. I should like myself to inquire by what authority the Doorkeeper has removed a convenience for the members of the House from the Hall of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has charge of the furniture of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. He has charge of the furniture, but not of the conveniences, not so as to authorize him to come in here and take the sofas put here for the convenience of members. If he has that right, he would have as much right to take my chair or my desk away as he has to take away the sofas that since I have been a member of this House have been provided for the comfort of members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire into the matter.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for steam machinery—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting estimates of deficiencies in appropriations for the Geological Survey—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of deficiency for army and navy pensions—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

MONDAY March 28, 1898.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PENSION STATISTICS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 21st instant, a statement showing, by classes, the number of all pensioners on the rolls at this time, and especially the number of persons drawing pensions under special acts of Congress, also the percentage of men, on the one hand, and women and children on the other, drawing pensions by special act of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SUPERVISING SURGEON-GENERAL'S REPORT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 21st instant, the preliminary report upon the operations of the Marine-Hospital Service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1897; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 22, 1898, a letter from the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, inclosing the report of the director of the hygienic laboratory of the Marine-Hospital Service, conveying the results of bacteriological and other investigations relative to the pollution of the water supply of the city of Washington; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a memorial in reference to the possession of Annette Island by the Indians of Metlakahtla. It is a protest against the Government permitting white persons to enter that island for the purpose of mining, and so forth. This protest is signed by Alice B. Coleman, president; Mary C. Reynolds, secretary; Gertrude L. Davis, treasurer, and Mrs. James McWhinnie, superintendent of the Alaska work of the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society.

Having some personal knowledge of the work that Rev. Mr. Duncan has done for the Indians of Alaska at New Metlakahtla, I desire to express the hope that Congress will be very careful in dealing with that question and not permit the whites to go upon that island to despoil it, possibly to interrupt seriously the work of that most estimable man, who has given his life to the civilization and Christianization of those Indians. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 4257) to increase the pension of Mary M. Strong, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Thomas J. Strong; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 4258) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy Jackson, of Lincoln, in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HANNA introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 4259) to grant a pension to Amelia F. Seywert (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4260) granting a pension to Mary E. V. Jones (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 4261) granting an increase of pension to Mary Schyllander (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4262) granting a pension to John W. Wycoff (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4263) to grant a pension to Charlotte S. Rhind.

Mr. HANNA introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (S. 4264) to correct the military record of Thomas Woodruff (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4265) to correct the military record of George C. Shiplett (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 4266) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Charles A. Bell (with accompanying papers).

Mr. HANNA introduced a bill (S. 4267) for the relief of Mrs. Lavinia M. Payne; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 4268) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin A. Burtram; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 4269) granting a pension to Margerett Ferriter; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 4270) to amend military record of James H. Gould; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4271) granting a pension to Caroline Luebke; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 4272) for the relief of certain settlers on lands within the limits of railroad land grants; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 4273) removing the charge of desertion from the name of Calvin Weaver, of Lebanon, Ind.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4274) increasing the pension of John W. Rollins, of Danville, Ind.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KENNEY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 4275) to promote the efficiency of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 130) relative to an increase of chaplains in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ERECTION OF TEMPORARY FORTIFICATIONS IN STATES.

Mr. BACON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 129) relative to suspension of part of section 355 of Revised Statutes, relative to erection of forts, fortifications, and so forth; which was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in any case of emergency where in the opinion of the Secretary of War the immediate erection of any fort or fortification may be deemed important and urgent, and where the legislature of the State in which it is proposed to erect such fort or fortification shall not be in session, so much of section 355 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as prohibits the erection of said fort or fortification until the consent of said legislature has been given shall be suspended so far as to authorize the construction of any temporary fort or fortification upon the written consent of the owner of the land upon which said temporary fort or fortification is to be placed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in moving the reference of the joint resolution, I desire to say simply one word. Under the law as it now exists the War Department is prohibited from spending any money upon forts, fortifications, or any structures of that kind until the consent of the legislature of the State in which the land is situated has been obtained. It is important that there should be a suspension in cases of emergency, and the joint resolution which I have introduced is simply one suspending so much of section 355 of the Revised Statutes as makes the consent of the legislature a prerequisite to the erection of any fortification where the consent of the owner of the land has been secured.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator read that provision?

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Delaware asks that I read the section of the Revised Statutes, which I will proceed to do. Section 355 is as follows:

SEC. 355. No public money shall be expended upon any site or land purchased by the United States for the purposes of erecting thereon any armory, arsenal, fort, fortification, navy-yard, custom-house, light-house, or other public building, of any kind whatever, until the written opinion of the Attorney-General shall be had in favor of the validity of the title, nor until the consent of the legislature of the State in which the land or site may be to such purchase has been given. The district attorneys of the United States, upon the application of the Attorney-General, shall furnish any assistance or information in their power in relation to the titles of the public property lying within their respective districts. And the Secretaries of the Departments, upon the application of the Attorney-General, shall procure any additional evidence of title which he may deem necessary, and which may not be in the possession of the officers of the Government, and the expense of procuring it shall be paid out of the appropriations made for the contingencies of the Departments, respectively.

The circumstance which has brought this matter immediately to my attention arose upon an application to the War Department to erect a fortification at a certain point in Georgia. I have a communication from the Chief of Engineers, which was authorized by the Secretary of War, consenting to the erection there provided so much of this statute as requires the consent of the legislature shall first be suspended by act of Congress.

Whether the Secretary of War is entirely right in his construction—that he would be prohibited in a case where the land was donated or a consent has been given by the owner thereof for such fortification to be constructed—is not a question which it is necessary for us now to stop to determine. The statute, it is true, says in case of purchase. This is a time when prompt action is needed.

The only purpose of the joint resolution is to authorize the Secretary of War, in a case where he deems it important, to erect a temporary fortification; that when he determines it to be a case of emergency, he shall, in the exercise of his discretion, go ahead and do it without waiting for the consent of the legislature, which can only be obtained when the legislature is in session. In the case in point the legislature is not in session, and will not be in session until next October, and it is important that there should be no delay, that there should be no question, that there should be no controversy among those who are charged with this public duty as to whether they have the authority.

Mr. GRAY. I shall ask that the joint resolution may go over.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Delaware will not ask that it may go over. If he objects, of course, under the rule, I am compelled to submit, though, in the present emergency, I very much regret it.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest that the Senator from Georgia can accomplish all he desires by making his joint resolution apply to this particular case. Certainly it is an unfavorable time for any general legislation upon this subject in a hasty manner. If he makes it apply to the particular case, referring to his own State, I shall not be disposed to object; but if there is to be any general legislation it ought to be considered by a committee of the Senate and acted upon after proper and due consideration.

Mr. BACON. I have no disposition, of course, to have any legislation apply to the States of either of the Senators if they may not so desire. I regard it as an emergency in the case of the State of Georgia, and I ask that the joint resolution be amended so far as to insert the words "in the State of Georgia" in the appropriate place. I have not the joint resolution before me, and consequently can not suggest the place in the same where the insertion should be made.

In order that Senators may not misunderstand the joint resolution, I will state that it does not propose to do anything over the objection of a State. It is not proposed to do anything to which the State will be assumed to have objected. It is designed for the protection of the State and merely provides for an emergency when the State is not in a position to give the consent which the law now requires, acting upon the assumption that the State would consent if it had the opportunity.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have conversed with the Chief of Engineers upon this matter and he is quite seriously embarrassed in regard to several places. He dare not take the responsibility of beginning even a minor fortification in any place where the Government has no title to the land, and he is very much embarrassed by it. If it be thought wise, it would be a great relief to him to have the joint resolution passed. I suggest as a mitigation of the apparent violation of State rights that notice be sent to the governor and that he be asked whether he has any objection. That would help it a little.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the order of business, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the consideration of the joint resolution, and it lies over until to-morrow.

Mr. BACON subsequently said: I desire to ask that the joint resolution which I introduced this morning relative to the construction of fortifications may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and in doing so I desire to say simply a word.

The restriction in the statute of the United States is not for the protection of State rights, as some gentlemen seem to assume, but it is for the protection of the property of the United States, and for this purpose prohibits the investment of money in the construction of fortifications until the title of the Government has been assured. The joint resolution simply proposes to waive this precaution on the part of the United States Government and to suspend the operation of that statute so far as to permit the erection of temporary fortifications upon the consent of the owner of the land.

I ask that the joint resolution may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That reference will be made, in the absence of objection.

DESTRUCTION OF THE BATTLE SHIP MAINE.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the message of the President of the United States, sent in this morning, be read at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

For some time prior to the visit of the Maine to Havana Harbor our consular representatives pointed out the advantages to flow from the visit of national ships to the Cuban waters, in accustoming the people to the presence of our flag as the symbol of good will and of our ships in the fulfillment of the mission of protection to American interests, even though no immediate need therefor might exist.

Accordingly on the 24th of January last, after conference with the Spanish minister, in which the renewal of visits of our war vessels to Spanish waters was discussed and accepted, the peninsular authorities at Madrid and Havana were advised of the purpose of this Government to resume friendly naval visits at Cuban ports, and that in that view the Maine would forthwith call at the port of Havana.

This announcement was received by the Spanish Government with appreciation of the friendly character of the visit of the Maine, and with notification of intention to return the courtesy by sending Spanish ships to the principal ports of the United States. Meanwhile the Maine entered the port of Havana on the 25th of January, her arrival being marked with no special incident besides the exchange of customary salutes and ceremonial visits.

The Maine continued in the harbor of Havana during the three weeks following her arrival. No appreciable excitement attended her stay; on the contrary, a feeling of relief and confidence followed the resumption of the long-interrupted friendly intercourse. So noticeable was this immediate effect of her visit that the consul-general strongly urged that the presence of our ships in Cuban waters should be kept up by retaining the Maine at Havana or, in the event of her recall, by sending another vessel there to take her place.

At forty minutes past 9 in the evening of the 15th of February the Maine was destroyed by an explosion, by which the entire forward part of the ship was utterly wrecked. In this catastrophe 2 officers and 264 of her crew perished, those who were not killed outright by her explosion being penned between decks by the tangle of wreckage and drowned by the immediate sinking of the hull.

Prompt assistance was rendered by the neighboring vessels anchored in the harbor, aid being especially given by the boats of the Spanish cruiser Alfonso XII and the Ward Line steamer City of Washington, which lay not far distant. The wounded were generously cared for by the authorities of Havana, the hospitals being freely opened to them, while the earliest recovered bodies of the dead were interred by the municipality in a public cemetery in the city. Tributes of grief and sympathy were offered from all official quarters of the island.

The appalling calamity fell upon the people of our country with crushing force, and for a brief time an intense excitement prevailed, which in a community less just and self-controlled than ours might have led to hasty acts of blind resentment. This spirit, however, soon gave way to the calmer processes of reason and to the resolve to investigate the facts and await material proof before forming a judgment as to the cause, the responsibility, and, if the facts warranted, the remedy due. This course necessarily recommended itself from the outset to the Executive, for only in the light of a dispassionately ascertained certainty could it determine the nature and measure of its full duty in the matter.

The usual procedure was followed, as in all cases of casualty or disaster to national vessels of any maritime State. A naval court of inquiry was at once organized, composed of officers well qualified by rank and practical experience to discharge the onerous duty imposed upon them. Aided by a strong force of wreckers and divers, the court proceeded to make a thorough investigation on the spot, employing every available means for the impartial and exact determination of the causes of the explosion. Its operations have been conducted with the utmost deliberation and judgment, and while independently pursued no attainable source of information was neglected, and the fullest opportunity was allowed for a simultaneous investigation by the Spanish authorities.

The finding of the court of inquiry was reached, after twenty-three days of continuous labor, on the 21st of March instant, and, having been approved on the 22d by the commander in chief of the United States naval force on the North Atlantic Station, was transmitted to the Executive.

It is herewith laid before the Congress, together with the voluminous testimony taken before the court.

Its purport is, in brief, as follows:

When the Maine arrived at Havana she was conducted by the regular Government pilot to buoy No. 4, to which she was moored in from 5½ to 6 fathoms of water.

The state of discipline on board and the condition of her magazines, boilers, coal bunkers, and storage compartments are passed in review, with the conclusion that excellent order prevailed and that no indication of any cause for an internal explosion existed in any quarter.

At 8 o'clock in the evening of February 15 everything had been reported secure, and all was quiet.

At forty minutes past 9 o'clock the vessel was suddenly destroyed.

There were two distinct explosions, with a brief interval between them.

The first lifted the forward part of the ship very perceptibly. The second, which was more open, prolonged, and of greater volume, is attributed by the court to the partial explosion of two or more of the forward magazines.

The evidence of the divers establishes that the after part of the ship was practically intact and sank in that condition a very few moments after the explosion. The forward part was completely demolished.

Upon the evidence of a concurrent external cause the finding of the court is as follows:

At frame 17 the outer shell of the ship, from a point 11½ feet from the middle line of the ship and 6 feet above the keel when in its normal position, has been forced up so as to be now about 4 feet above the surface of the water therefore about 34 feet above where it would be had the ship sunk uninjured.

The outside bottom plating is bent into a reversed V shape (Λ), the after wing of which, about 15 feet broad and 32 feet in length (from frame 17 to frame 25), is doubled back upon itself against the continuation of the same plating, extending forward.

At frame 18 the vertical keel is broken in two and the flat keel bent into an angle similar to the angle formed by the outside bottom plates. This break is now about 6 feet below the surface of the water and about 30 feet above its normal position.

In the opinion of the court this effect could have been produced only by the explosion of a mine situated under the bottom of the ship at about frame 18 and somewhat on the port side of the ship.

The conclusions of the court are:

That the loss of the Maine was not in any respect due to fault or negligence on the part of any of the officers or members of her crew;

That the ship was destroyed by the explosion of a submarine mine, which caused the partial explosion of two or more of her forward magazines; and

That no evidence has been obtainable fixing the responsibility for the destruction of the Maine upon any person or persons.

I have directed that the finding of the court of inquiry and the views of this Government thereon be communicated to the Government of Her Majesty the Queen Regent, and I do not permit myself to doubt that the sense of justice of the Spanish nation will dictate a course of action suggested by honor and the friendly relations of the two Governments.

It will be the duty of the Executive to advise the Congress of the result, and in the meantime deliberate consideration is invoked.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
March 28, 1898.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I call for the reading of the findings of the court of inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the Secretary will read the findings.

The Secretary read as follows:

U. S. S. IOWA (1st rate),
Key West, Fla., Monday, March 21, 1898—10 a. m.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment of yesterday.

Present: All the members and the judge-advocate.

The record of last day's proceedings was read over and approved.

The court was then cleared for deliberation.

After full and mature consideration of all the testimony before it, the court finds as follows:

1. That the U. S. battle ship Maine arrived in the harbor of Havana, Cuba, on the 25th day of January, 1898, and was taken to buoy No. 4, in from 5½ to 6 fathoms of water, by the regular Government pilot.

The United States consul-general at Havana had notified the authorities at that place the previous evening of the intended arrival of the Maine.

2. The state of discipline on board the Maine was excellent, and all orders and regulations in regard to the care and safety of the ship were strictly carried out.

All ammunition was stowed in accordance with prescribed instructions, and proper care was taken whenever ammunition was handled.

Nothing was stowed in any one of the magazines or shell rooms which was not permitted to be stowed there.

The magazines and shell rooms were always locked after having been opened, and after the destruction of the Maine the keys were found in their proper place in the captain's cabin, everything having been reported secure that evening at 8 p. m.

The temperatures of the magazines and shell rooms were taken daily and reported. The only magazine which had an undue amount of heat was the after 10-inch magazine, and that did not explode at the time the Maine was destroyed.

The torpedo war heads were all stowed in the after part of the ship, under the ward room, and neither caused nor participated in the destruction of the Maine.

The dry gun-cotton primers and detonators were stowed in the cabin aft, and remote from the scene of the explosion.

Waste was carefully looked after on board the Maine to obviate danger. Special orders in regard to this had been given by the commanding officer.

Varnishes, driers, alcohol, and other combustibles of this nature were stowed on or above the main deck and could not have had anything to do with the destruction of the Maine.

The medical stores were stowed aft, under the ward room, and remote from the scene of the explosion.

No dangerous stores of any kind were stowed below in any of the other storerooms.

The coal bunkers were inspected daily. Of those bunkers adjacent to the forward magazines and shell rooms four were empty, namely, B3, B4, B5, B6. A15 had been in use that day, and A16 was full of New River coal. This coal had been carefully inspected before receiving it on board. The bunker in which it was stowed was accessible on three sides at all times, and the fourth side at this time on account of bunkers B4 and B6 being empty. This bunker, A16, had been inspected that day by the engineer officer on duty.

The fire alarms in the bunkers were in working order, and there had never been a case of spontaneous combustion of coal on board the Maine.

The two after boilers of the ship were in use at the time of the disaster, but for auxiliary purposes only, with a comparatively low pressure of steam, and being tended by a reliable watch.

These boilers could not have caused the explosion of the ship. The four forward boilers have since been found by the divers, and are in a fair condition.

On the night of the destruction of the Maine everything had been reported secure for the night at 8 p. m. by reliable persons, through the proper authorities, to the commanding officer. At the time the Maine was destroyed the ship was quiet, and, therefore, least liable to accident caused by movements from those on board.

EXPLOSIONS.

3. The destruction of the Maine occurred at 9.40 p. m. on the 15th day of February, 1898, in the harbor of Havana, Cuba, she being at the time moored to the same buoy to which she had been taken upon her arrival. There were two explosions of a distinctly different character, with a very short but distinct interval between them, and the forward part of the ship was lifted to a marked degree at the time of the first explosion. The first explosion was more in the nature of a report like that of a gun, while the second explosion was more open, prolonged, and of greater volume. This second explosion was, in the opinion of the court, caused by the partial explosion of two or more of the forward magazines of the Maine.

CONDITION OF THE WRECK.

4. The evidence bearing upon this, being principally obtained from divers, did not enable the court to form a definite conclusion as to the condition of the wreck, although it was established that the after part of the ship was practically intact, and sank in that condition a very few minutes after the destruction of the forward part.

The following facts in regard to the forward part of the ship are, however, established by the testimony:

A portion of the port side of the protective deck, which extends from about frame 30 to about frame 41, was blown up, aft, and over to port. The main deck, from about frame 30 to about frame 41, was blown up, aft, and slightly over to starboard, folding the forward part of the middle superstructure over and on top of the after part.

This was, in the opinion of the court, caused by the partial explosion of two or more of the forward magazines of the Maine.

5. At frame 17 the outer shell of the ship, from a point 11½ feet from the middle line of the ship, and 6 feet above the keel when in its normal position, has been forced up so as to be now about 4 feet above the surface of the water, therefore about 34 feet above where it would be had the ship sunk uninjured.

The outside bottom plating is bent into a reversed V shape (Λ), the after wing of which, about 15 feet broad and 32 feet in length (from frame 17 to frame 25), is doubled back upon itself against the continuation of the same plating, extending forward.

At frame 18 the vertical keel is broken in two, and the flat keel bent into an angle similar to the angle formed by the outside bottom plating. This break is now about 6 feet below the surface of the water, and about 30 feet above its normal position.

In the opinion of the court this effect could have been produced only by the explosion of a mine situated under the bottom of the ship at about frame 18 and somewhat on the port side of the ship.

6. The court finds that the loss of the Maine on the occasion named was not in any respect due to fault or negligence on the part of any of the officers or members of the crew of said vessel.

7. In the opinion of the court the Maine was destroyed by the explosion of a submarine mine, which caused the partial explosion of two or more of the forward magazines.

8. The court has been unable to obtain evidence fixing the responsibility for the destruction of the Maine upon any person or persons.

W. T. SAMPSON,
Captain, U. S. N., President.
A. MARIX,
Lieut. Com., U. S. N., Judge-Advocate.

The court, having finished the inquiry it was ordered to make, adjourned at 11 a. m. to await the action of the convening authority.

W. T. SAMPSON,
Captain, U. S. N., President.
A. MARIX,
Lieut. Com., U. S. N., Judge-Advocate.

U. S. FLAGSHIP NEW YORK,
Off Key West, Fla., March 22, 1898.

The proceedings and findings of the court of inquiry in the above case are approved.

M. SICARD,
Rear-Admiral, Commander in Chief of the United States Naval Force on the North Atlantic Station.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the message, report, and testimony be ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. PETTUS. Does the motion include the evidence?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It includes the evidence. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the immediate use of the Senate 2,000 additional copies of the message of the President of the United States transmitting the report of the naval board upon the destruction of the U. S. S. Maine and of the report of the naval board and the testimony taken by said board, said copies to be delivered to the Senate document room.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment relative to the use of pneumatic tubes in the mail service, intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment relative to the use of hand roller presses for plate printing of notes, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORMAN submitted an amendment relative to the purchase of the patent on controlling mechanism for turrets, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRIES.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That 1,000 copies of the Senate document, report of hearing in relation to bill (S. 624) to establish the department of commerce and industries, ordered printed by resolution of the Senate of March 24, 1898, be supplied to the Senate Committee on Commerce.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on Thursday last the Senate kindly consented to grant to the Committee on Pensions an hour to-day about this time for the purpose of considering unobjected pension cases now on the Calendar. I understand the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] desires to address the Senate in relation to observations he made in Cuba during a recent trip to that island; and as the galleries are expectant in view of that announced fact, I rise to request that the order for the consideration of pension bills be changed from to-day until to-morrow after the routine morning business, so that the Senator from Mississippi may now proceed with his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the change of order from to-day until to-morrow at 1 o'clock for the consideration of private pension bills on the Calendar? The Chair hears no objection, and that is the order.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, as one of the party of members of this Congress who lately visited the Island of Cuba by the invitation of Mr. Hearst, proprietor of the New York Journal, and following the example of my associates on that voyage, I have purposed for a short while to give to the Senate and the country the impressions which I received there from what I saw and from what I heard from creditable sources.

It looks like a work of supererogation for me to address the Senate when the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] in his cool, clear, impartial, unprejudiced manner has laid his conclusions before the country, followed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], equally clear, equally cogent, graphic, both of them falling below the conservative mark, and the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire, somewhat tinged with a sympathetic glow. Then came that magnificent and impassioned piece of eloquence from the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], that not only laid the fearful facts of this case before the Senate, but invested them with a depth and solemnity of feeling that is rarely seen or heard in this Chamber.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, feeling that in this critical moment, this moment of gravest crisis, even the humblest speaker must assume a responsibility in addressing himself to this question, I venture without hesitation to take that responsibility and to perform what I conceive to be my solemn duty to the Senate and to the country.

We have before us, Mr. President, a proposition, first, that appeals to the humanity of the country to feed the starving, to clothe the naked, and to nurse the sick of that afflicted island. I desire to say here that I stand committed to any proposition, either private or public, to afford all the relief that we can give to the Cuban people, some of whom, alas, are to-day beyond the reach of charity or help.

Mr. President, before we can possibly understand the suffering that exists to-day—not exaggerated by sensational newspapers, but so direful in its details as to absolutely torture the credulity of the eyewitness and make him doubt his senses—and before we propose a remedy, we must examine into the causes, and that will require at my hands a short historical retrospect, which I will give without any arrangement.

We have heard on this floor and elsewhere throughout the country denunciation of General Weyler as the cause of all the misery that has spread through the most beautiful island in the world. The Captain-General's was not the brain that conceived, but his was the hand that executed. He was the mere instrument of another; and this whole business, which has logically come down to a state of famine and starvation and of the wholesale extermination of a brave and generous people, was a deliberate and cold calculation that emanated from the brain of Canovas.

In the war that ran from 1868 to 1878 extermination was the policy of Canovas; and when Campos was called to command in the field and in the civil government of Cuba, in a letter to the prime minister he said:

> There are but two alternatives—one is to grant these people their just rights and the other is extermination, and I refuse to be the instrument of the latter.

Obeying those humane impulses, with which he had always been credited, Martinez Campos negotiated what was called the agreement of Zanjon, which brought the rebels back to their allegiance, with the promise of autonomy similar to that which is now proposed, but not so broad.

Canovas, then prime minister, refused to submit to the Spanish Cortes the agreement for ratification, and was dismissed from power. Then Campos, who was called to the ministry as its premier, submitted it and had it ratified by the Cortes. In the interval of time, with all the violated promises and broken pledges made by that agreement, the Cubans, more desperate than ever before, again appealed to arms under circumstances the most discouraging; and again, by the hand of fate, it seems that Canovas was placed at the head of the ministry, and again the old policy of extermination was resolved upon, and General Weyler (Martinez Campos again retiring as being an unfit instrument) was placed in command to carry out the designs of Canovas, when it was cruelly proposed to drive from their homes hundreds of thousands of people, to apply the torch to their dwellings, so that they could not return to them for shelter, and shut everybody found outside the military zone in the garrisons and towns and fortresses. Then a deliberate resolve was made that the Cuban people should be exterminated by famine; and to this hour no man can show one single measure of relief which has come from the country which has inflicted untold horrors upon those people.

Mr. President, let us inquire who are the reconcentrados? Are they insurgents who took up arms in their desperate appeal to the God of battles to establish their liberties? Not one of them. Those people are the poor peasantry of Cuba; they are people against whom there has never been anything alleged by any Spanish partisan—not one single act of disloyalty or of disobedience—people whose allegiance to the Spanish Crown has never in any manner or shape, to my knowledge, been questioned.

Those people, with perhaps an indifference to their liberties, yet with natural sympathy for the people of their own flesh and blood, were quietly cultivating their fields; and it was for the further reason that those people were supposed capable of furnishing shelter and food to the rebel armies that they were brought within the lines of reconcentration and doomed to gradual starvation, for which the history of no other country on God's earth has ever yet offered, thank Heaven, either a precedent or a parallel.

We have heard of the miseries of war inflicted by Alva in the Low Countries; we know what religious fanaticism can do in a war of religion; we know what the Christian has perpetrated upon the savage; but in all the horrors that stain the annals of human history we have yet to find before this an instance where a great government has deliberately planned the starvation and death of its innocent, loyal, and unoffending subjects, with no claim of a difference in religion, in blood, in tradition, in history, or in anything else, except that they possessed the land which the Spaniard coveted.

Mr. President, it is not to be questioned that along with these seven or eight hundred thousand poor people of humble station there were dragged into that reconcentration also many people of influence and wealth; and we saw the sad spectacle, as has been stated upon this floor, of people reared in affluence perishing of starvation on marble floors and in gilded salons, too proud to receive alms, too proud to beg.

It is true, Mr. President, that a few other people were brought into the ranks of the reconcentrados, but the principal starvation extended to this class, who never yet have offended anybody. It is but natural that through sympathy parties of the insurgents in the island were fed and sheltered by these people, and that help and food and shelter would have been given by the same people by their generous humanity to the Spanish troops who were traversing the island. This is true.

When Captain-General Weyler issued his order which called these people within what is termed "the military zone," I asked him in a short interview the question how he proposed to take care of them. He said, "Portions of land will be allotted them." Then I said, "But suppose they do not come in, what will happen then?" He replied, "They will be treated as insurgents, because they would be disobeying orders, and they will suffer accordingly."

Now, Mr. President, when I say that this plan of starvation was deliberate, the fact is attested by every incident in this sorrowful history. Not only were these people shut up within the confines of Cuban cities, towns, fortresses, and garrisons, unable to till the soil, which never yet has been allotted according to Weyler's proposition; but when I went to the camp at Matanzas with my friends, the hospital there showed a degree of human misery and want that is fixed indelibly in my memory and with a horror never to be forgotten.

When I saw the beautiful blue waves of the Bay of Matanzas and those people stretched in misery in shanties along the side of the rocky mountains, all at once the thought occurred to me, Why did they not catch the fish and live upon them? And I put the question to the American consul, who said: "Fish! They are not allowed to fish. Anybody found fishing along these shores is immediately shot to death."

There has, as I said, Mr. President, yet been no measure of relief extended to those people except that given by the generosity of the people of these United States in a private capacity. We know what a wave of generous enthusiasm has gone over the country, how liberally our people have responded to the call for help, and yet we all know human nature, and that this feeling of charity will gradually subside, and yet the want will continue. It will require, as I believe the President will suggest, that an appropriation of money be made by Congress, so that the supplies furnished to those who are famishing may be steady and sufficient.

But, Mr. President, are we to apply the ointment when the knife is needed? Are we to continue to feed the hungry and the sick and clothe the naked without first removing the cause which operates to produce these effects? That would not be wisdom. It is due to ourselves that we say to the power that inflicts this misery, "You must stop or the strong arm of the American Government, with all the power of 74,000,000 people, will be used to cause a cessation of these dreadful calamities."

It has seemed to me, sir, speaking with due respect to two Administrations of the different parties, that I may be pardoned for saying that, though controlled by exactly the same influences, the proposition which has been made by negotiation to appease Spanish wrath or to mitigate the hostilities of the insurgents themselves, in order to bring these two peoples into some sort of relation that will lead up to and bring an enduring and honorable peace to both, has not only been wasted time, but it has been something of an assumption of the inferiority of the insurgents themselves.

Here we have had the spectacle of two Cabinets, representing the great American nation, anxiously endeavoring to restore peace to that afflicted island, anxious to satisfy the demands of Spain upon her subjects; and yet, in this game of negotiation, no man has ever heard that a commissioner has been sent to counsel with the insurgent forces to ask them what will satisfy them.

Who raised this war? Whose flag and whose army stand to-day as defiant, and more so probably, than ever before in the history of the struggle to resist the efforts to subdue them? The insurgents. And yet the insurgents have never been asked to participate in this game of negotiation; they have never been asked: "What will you have, and what will you agree to?"

This negotiation I will not say is imbecile, but its inutility ought to have been obvious to any man who had studied this great question. It was not to be supposed that because the United States believe that Spain has conceded a degree of autonomy which should be sufficient to satisfy the demands of the insurgents that the insurgents are to have no voice in the matter. Yet, Mr. President, as Senators know, the insurgents have never yet been consulted. Occasionally, when an expression has found its way into the public prints from the Commander in Chief Gomez, from the president of the civil government, or from the subordinate military leaders, there has been a uniform tone of determination expressed, that could not be doubted, that independence, and independence alone, is the goal toward which they are struggling, and with nothing else will they ever be satisfied or ever lay down their arms.

Mr. President, I firmly believe that these men mean every single word that they say. Fourteen months ago, returning from Cuba, I stated then in the public prints that at no time would the insurgents be satisfied with less than complete independence. If you grant them everything that Canada enjoys, with a friendly or a neutral cabinet or a hostile cabinet, they will not be satisfied; they will not be satisfied with any autonomy which falls short of independence.

Let the Cubans have a prohibitive tariff against the mother country, let them have in every sense what the British call responsible government, and yet so long as the yellow flag of Spain salutes the blue sky of Cuba those people will never lay down their arms. They have for more than a century been the victims of duplicity and treachery. They have had agreements often made, and as often violated. They know the value of the pledges that they may receive, even if guaranteed by the American Government, and these men to a man are determined to die rather than submit to any promise short of independence.

Now, Mr. President, it need not be disputed that the insurgents have brought about a condition of things which their consent alone can help to remedy. It may be that they are at fault; that patience would have been more creditable to the oppressed than resistance; that manhood should have been quenched; that the subservient neck should have been bowed to receive the yoke and the humble back bared to the stripe; but, Mr. President, they who conceive that the Cubans are trifling with this great question, that they are simply amusing themselves with a revolt that causes the sacrifice of the lives of hundreds of thousands of people for no other purpose than to secure a decree of autonomy, little know the character of the people about whom they speak.

I recollect shortly after my return from Cuba a year ago I received a dispatch from a very distinguished gentleman who participated in the ten years' war from 1868 to 1878, in which he said: "I beg to thank you for correctly interpreting the temper of the Cuban people. Your Secretary of State is simply fooling away his time."

Mr. MASON. What was the date of that?

Mr. MONEY. About January 11 or 12.

Mr. MASON. A year ago?

Mr. MONEY. About a year ago.

I alluded a few moments ago to the fact that the statement as to the number of deaths from starvation made by the honorable Senators who have preceded me was exceedingly conservative. From information which I have received on my own account, I believe the number very far exceeds that amount. I recollect that only three or four days ago La Discussion, one of the two morning papers published in the city of Havana not suppressed by the Spaniards because favorable to the Spanish Government, said, in compliment to the Red Cross Society, that Miss Barton and her agents were to-day feeding over 300,000 starving people, and those were outside of the thousands who are being fed by the supplies received by the American consuls at the different ports.

That is the condition to-day. Fewer are dying, it is true, because the material is being consumed; and yet, when this bloody work is going on, we have professions made to us that district after district has been pacified; that a state of peace reigns through the devastated and desolate country. Yes, Mr. President, the peace that reigned at Warsaw prevails to-day over the fertile valleys and beautiful hills of Cuba. It is the peace of the grave.

We were told by the governor of the Province of Matanzas, a gentleman who has been correctly represented here as a man of great intelligence and large humanity, who evidently felt deeply the miseries that surrounded him on every hand, which he could not alleviate, that he looked to God and the United States of America for help for the starving people of his province. I asked him this question:

Why do you not permit the people concentrated around the walls of your city to go abroad in that most beautiful valley of Cuba, the valley of Gumurri, the most fertile land on earth, and pursue their vocations as farmers and tillers of the soil?

He said:

Most of the men have died; they have neither homes to go to, oxen to plow, implements to use, seeds to sow, nor have they the strength in their starved bodies to use them if they had them.

I found, Mr. President, before I left that city, another reason, and a more powerful one, why these wretched creatures do not leave the city if they are permitted to do so. The governor said he had signed over 4,560 passes that were issued to people to go beyond the lines, and we were told that the governor would grant passes whenever anybody requested them; but of the people who went beyond the lines no one ever returned.

Mr. GRAY. Are they permitted to return to their homes?

Mr. MONEY. So far as the civil governor of Matanzas is concerned, he expressed a willingness for them to go to their homes; but we found, upon examination, that Molinas, who was the general in command in that province, was denounced by Cubans and Americans to be as bloody as Captain-General Weyler in his methods and more heartless in his cruelty; that anyone with one of those passes who was found beyond the barriers would be immediately shot by the military. So the people clung to starvation and present safety, rather than venture themselves among the Spanish soldiery of the interior. This is the condition there to-day.

I said that those Senators who have preceded me upon this question had understated the condition of affairs, according to my information. An American consul wrote to me on the 23d day of November that in his province 100,000 had perished of starvation, and he knew it to be true that in his consular district 50,000 had perished. I saw him the other day administering charity given by the great-hearted people of the United States, and he told me that thirty-six mayors of towns, cities, and villages had put the number of deaths at 10,000 greater than he had written me.

I had an interview with a highly educated and intelligent gentleman, who is to-day the mayor of the city of Santa Clara. This gentleman was for sixteen months a surgeon in the insurgent army. He spoke good English. He was evidently a great deal in sympathy with the people of the island, although holding office under the autonomist government, which, when practicable, had put Cubans in power who had some sort of affiliation with the common people.

I said to him, "Doctor, I want to ask you some plain questions, and you can at any time tell me whether you think they are improper or impertinent, and can refuse to answer them if you like. What I want is information." I asked him, "What is the population of Santa Clara?" He said, "Between twelve and fifteen thousand." I said, "About what number of reconcentrados have perished of starvation or diseases immediately incident to famine in Santa Clara?" He said, "Over 6,000, and still the work is going on."

Mr. GRAY. Within what time was that?

Mr. MONEY. Within one year—the past year, 1897—and still the work is going on in the hospitals and in the camps. It is woeful to behold the emaciated frames and this swelling, beriberi, one of the worst results of starvation, which have marked their victims for an early grave, but there are yet a great number of people who can be cured, who can be restored to health and vitality, who can have medicine, food, and clothing administered so wisely as not only to spare an enormons degree of suffering, but to save a great many human lives, and give at least a remnant of population for the future peopling of the island. How is this to be done?

I am asked the question by the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] whether these are generally white people. As a general thing they are white people. Now and then we saw colored people of every shade, but they were very rarely seen. I will say that in the Island of Cuba the small number of black people somewhat surprised us.

Mr. President, how are we to remedy this evil? This flow of charity constantly going on by the hands of the General Government will feed and clothe, but will that eradicate the cause? Are we to stultify ourselves by continuing to pour out our treasure upon the island and leave at the same time the operating cause in full force? Have we a right to do it? We are here to-day without any constitutional authority, specially delegated, to give a cent. We are speaking from the emotions, the humane impulses of the great American heart, which will rise from one ocean to the other and say, "Do anything that will effect the purpose."

I say that in order to effectually remedy this evil the United States must in a positive and peremptory way, as civilly as possible and yet in tones that can not be misunderstood, declare that this war must end. Give Spain two weeks, or three, or four; let a hundred thousand people die if you will, but at last it must come to an end. We stand responsible to-day to civilization, to history, to the humanity of the latter end of the nineteenth century. We can not evade, if we would, the burden put upon our shoulders. We must obey the dictates of humanity and relieve that island in the most effective manner possible.

I have heretofore for a long time advocated in the press armed intervention in the Island of Cuba upon what I consider sound international-law grounds, from the fact that we have an interest in the matter that can be stated in dollars and cents, amounting to $50,000,000 in land and other property, amounting to $40,000,000 for money loaned, and a commerce amounting to eighty or ninety millions yearly.

I think I have shown that there has not been a war waged by a European power in Asia that was not based upon the commercial idea that their business was being interfered with or destroyed. It has been regarded as sufficient reason for interference, armed or otherwise, to protect trade and commerce. Upon that ground I based my plea for intervention in the affairs of Cuba, but to-day it would be to minimize the situation if I were to stand here and ask Congress to interfere now with this spectacle of distress and misery, too harrowing ever to be exaggerated or fairly depicted.

So I am before the Senate of the United States to give the result of my impressions and observations, asking them, because I have a remedy in my own head, whether it be good or bad, to take the initiative and boldly declare, as any European nation would if in our place, that we will not permit this condition of affairs to exist any longer. I ask honorable Senators if they know a nation upon the globe which would permit five or six hundred thousand people to be starved to death within five hours' sail of its shores without intervening with a strong hand to stop the outrage?

Some gentlemen seem to think that war will disturb business, and yesterday afternoon a gentleman who did me the honor to pay me a visit said that a noted business man had telegraphed to the President, "What are 258 human lives and a ship like the Maine worth compared with the loss to trade and commerce of New York City and of the United States?"

My God, Mr. President, have we gone into trade, so that all the manhood of the nation has been destroyed? Have we become deaf to humanity; have we no longer a conscience? I know that such an ignoble sentiment will find no echo in this Chamber or elsewhere in the Capitol; but if there be a man here who is in doubt as to what he should do as a representative of his State, as a representative of his people, of the great American public, just let him go into any city, town, or hamlet and make a speech for "peace at any price," and see what he will see and hear what he will hear; and that man in short order will be "a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief."

Not only that, but it has been somewhat the habit of those who want "peace at any price" to say that it will be a difficult war—a war that may be protracted and that will expose our seacoast to all sorts of depredations and harassment. Those are the chances of war. They are the concomitants of war. They belong to it, and we know when we undertake it that we face them. No man deprecates war more than I; I am naturally pacific; I hate strife; I love peace; but there are things worse than war. Thomas Carlyle said no chimney was so good that it did not have to be burnt out occasionally; and any sort of a war is better than a rotting peace that eats out the core and heart of the manhood of this country. [Applause n the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. MONEY. We want the salutary and clarifying influence of the tempest of popular indignation as it sweeps over the whole land to-day. Have gentlemen not heard it in their homes? Have they not felt the deep pulsing of the popular heart? Have they not heard it beating like the throb of war drums when the battle storm is bursting? Gentlemen, understand the people who are behind you. Take your cue from them. Act according to the impressions—always the best—of the common people, who rarely err when their feelings and emotions are excited, however much they may do so when an appeal is made to their judgment; and even there they are wiser than the wisest.

Mr. President, it is a fact that after one generation of the profoundest peace we have a condition of things in America which a war in my opinion would immensely better. War brings out not the commercial trait, not the business instinct, not the training faculties, not the skill to corner articles of general consumption at the cost of the consumer, not short cuts to wealth, but war brings out all the best traits of character.

It teaches us devotion, self-abnegation, courage. It teaches us to offer upon the altar of our country everything dear to us—sons and brothers and fathers and all that goes to make life happy and holy. It teaches us to rise above the petty, the unworthy, the selfish. It broadens our nature, and in my opinion a wholesome war, like one for human liberty and human life, will have its purgatorial effect upon this nation and we will come out of it, like the Phœnix from its ashes, renewed and with glory.

While on the Island of Cuba I conversed with people everywhere to whom I had access, whether they be Spaniard or Cuban, English or American. I found almost the same opinion prevailing as to the necessities of the present moment. There are to-day in the mountains of the eastern part of Cuba, and running along from Carcarajicera to Santiago de Cuba, 35,400 insurgent soldiers, according to a list prepared for me by a gentleman who is a nephew of one of the cabinet. He assured me that it was absolutely correct, and I had it verified by two other gentlemen, one a Cuban and one a resident American, who thought it was correct.

These men are better prepared than ever before. They are living upon the open country behind the hills. The Spanish are within garrison towns and railroad stations. They live within walls. They do not often venture abroad. The country is desolated; desolated as suggested to me this morning by the hands of the Cubans? That is a mistake. The Cubans have burnt the cane fields of the rich who refused to pay tax. There is not a cane mill grinding in Cuba to-day that is not paying a tax to the insurgents—not a single one.

Who devastated the country? Who broke up the small farms? Who imprisoned the small proprietor and agricultural laborer? Who shot down the cattle and left them? Who burned their homes, devastated their fields, laid waste the country and rendered it incapable of sustaining either the Spanish or the Cubans? This was the hand of the Spaniard; this was the hand of oppression, and this is the influence and the power which to-day is exercised, not to bring these people back, because they know the cause is helpless, but with dogged persistency and tenacity and ferocity never equaled, is attempting to keep these people beneath the iron heel, even though knowing that at last the result must be freedom.

When I saw the mournful city of Havana, one of the most beautiful in the world, with that glorious bay stretching out in its clover-leaf shape, with the rocky cliffs and the castles frowning from their summits and the long colonnades, with the tints peculiar to that climate, everything seemed to be tinged with sadness.

A pall hung over the landscape that dimmed the shining of the sun, and sadder than all was the flag fluttering at half-mast from the sunken Maine. From that broken and drowned hull, the restless tomb of scores of American heroes, the mast springs out, and from it floats the flag of the great Republic, springing like a flower from a grave. That flag to every Spanish eye seemed a thunderbolt of war; but to every oppressed, harassed, and distressed Cuban it was a metaphor of peace. This is the country to which both parties to the struggle look to settle differences.

To-day in the Island of Cuba, if I have not been deceived in the accounts I receive from most credible people, the Spaniards generally are ready to take out naturalization papers in the United States, however much they hate us. They see the coming event. They know that lex talionis may prevail, and in their imagination they see the horrors perpetrated upon an inoffensive and helpless people for generations, to be returned with compound interest upon their own heads.

They invite the citizenship and the protection of our flag, because it means security to life, to person, to property. On the other hand, the Cubans who are fighting to-day look upon us with admiration, with respect, with affection, with confidence, because in all the wide horizon of the world there has been no gleam of light except from the United States of America.

Mr. President, it is impossible, unless we discredit human nature, to believe that there could be anything but a successful issue to this struggle. These men are too brave, they have suffered too much, and now, when the price of blood and starvation has been paid, they will not relinquish the prize for which they have struggled. I for one have the utmost confidence in their success, and I hope there is not a man here to-day who will dare to say that they will not ultimately succeed. Not one Senator will dare to impeach the justice of Almighty God.

Mr. President, as to the issue of any possible war, which I deprecate as much as anybody, we have made the preparations which every Republic makes about the time it is too late. We hear men talk about economy when the war cloud is upon us. We are haggling over a few gunboats, a few frigates or battle ships. We see a disposition to hoard the public money. As De Witt said of the Dutch—always stingy in peace, lavish in time of war. However, we have preparations sufficient, because in my opinion there will be only a naval war.

I can not conceive of any situation in Cuba that will make necessary anything more than a blockade of two or three ports. There is nothing for the garrisons to eat. They are living upon almost daily rations. Yet with singular fatuity a tariff has been placed upon the necessities of life which it is almost impossible to credit—30 cents for a chicken, 30 cents for a like value of eggs, and $5 for every hog, and so on. All food products are taxed in the same way—this in a city that ought to throw wide its doors and hail relief.

As I passed along the streets of Havana, the capital city of the island, I saw a poor, crying woman sitting upon a stone step, holding in her arms a little child. My son threw some money into her lap, and she looked at him with something of indignation and scorn. Then we saw the child was dead. I was appealed to for aid by a woman in the streets of Matanzas, who followed me a square. I did not have a cent. I said, "Tell this woman to call on the American consul to-morrow." He said to her, "Call on the American consul, mañaña." With bitterness and scorn she said, "Yes; mañaña, mañaña; that is what the Spanish say."

The situation in Cuba is one which, as I said, can not be exaggerated, nor can it be credited. You must yourself see it to realize a picture of things as they are. I defy any pen to exaggerate it. It is well enough for gentlemen to talk of "alleged" horrors, to speak of sensational journalism, to ridicule even photographic cuts, when photographs can not lie; but there before the visitors to Havana were these scenes of misery, of death so horrible, that they sickened the people who saw them.

Mr. President, I know not what course the Congress of the United States may take. I find no suggestion in the President's message, which I do not attempt at this time at least to debate, of any demand upon Spain on account of the destruction of the Maine. It simply states that the report has been sent to the authorities at Madrid. We trust largely to the Executive, one of the most amiable and conscientious men I ever knew; but, Mr. President, we do not trust so much to the influences that seem to control his Administration.

With that consciousness, if others will avow it as openly as I do, it is not becoming to us to sit here quietly and await the slow progress of diplomacy. I regretted to see in a paper that two distinguished Senators, one of each party, had told the President that he could not much longer hold the Senate in check.

Hold the Senate in check! What power has the President ever to hold the Senate in check? When did he hold the Senate in check? "Much longer!" If there is a man here in this Hall to-day so basely subservient to the Executive power, any man so forgetful of the high calling of his office, any man so forgetful that he belongs to a coordinate branch of the Government that he would admit for a single moment that now or heretofore, at any time, he was or is capable of being checked by the Executive, that man is unworthy of a seat upon this floor.

I propose, as one, to make no factious opposition to the policy of the Administration. I propose, as one, to support with all my heart every measure of relief that may be proposed by the Executive; but I am also one of those who believe that the power is with Congress—the political power, the power that shapes the destiny of this great American people, lays down the rails upon which to run far into the future. I for one am not willing to abdicate any scintilla of the power vested in me as an American Senator to declare war, to do the thing that brings on war, to take part in the affairs of this great Government and shape its policy according to the dictates of humanity and the imperative will of the American people.

Mr. President, I am not one of those invited to the White House. I am not in the confidence of the Executive, but it does seem to me that the fact ought to be too obvious to be repeated here, that the Senate at least—I will not speak of the other House—is simply realizing to-day the necessities of this grave situation; that we have the care of the American Republic and must see to it that it suffers no detriment, and that we will do the things approved by our judgment and which seem necessary and wise to be done.

I can not imagine that this Government will do anything that is dishonorable, anything unbecoming a great and powerful nation, anything unworthy of the heritage of glory we have received from our forefathers, and it should be our care to see that it is transmitted to those who come after us untarnished in its luster. We are incapable and ought to be incapable, from the necessity of the case, from the great responsibility we have, from the environment around us, of doing the thing that is wrong, the thing that is dishonorable, the thing that is culpable.

We do not ask the approval of the nations of the earth. We simply command their respect. We do the things that should be done and nations say, "Well done." We are not asking Germany, France, or anybody else on top of the earth to dictate our policy or to shape our course. If any potentate in Europe, great or small, thinks this quarrel is his, let him interfere if he chooses. We shall not be daunted. We have reached at last that stage in the development of nations when we can afford to stand singly before the earth upon our own responsibility and do the things approved by our judgment.

Spain unfortunately has for four centuries been marking time when other nations have been marching. When they have been reaching out and developing into a broader and higher humanity, a brighter civilization, she has been a case of arrested development. She has no part in the spirit of this age. She is a dreadful anachronism. When did Spain win a battle? How many centuries have fled since her armies were victorious? When did Spain ever win a naval battle since Lepanto, three hundred years ago, when Don John of Austria crushed the Turkish fleet and humbled the Sublime Porte with an armada composed mainly of Genoese and Venetian ships, and supported by the genius of Doria and the skill of Barberini, the two Italian admirals?

Yet some people think it is a power to be feared. How is it that this nation, which once stood in the commanding position of arbiter of Europe, has reached its degradation? How is it that her victories are but memories? Four hundred years ago she began to pour out to the New World all the manhood, energy, enterprise, courage, in that gallant band of Conquistadores that overran the country from Sabine Pass to Patagonia, which established kingdoms and overcame nations.

Everything great, everything noble, has gone out of Spain and left the lees and dregs of manhood to perpetuate her population. She has expelled the Moor; she has expelled the Jew; she has expelled the Protestant; she has done the things she ought not to have done, and the curse of God has seemed to rest upon her ever since. It is as unpleasant to recite the crimes and failures of nations as those of individuals, but when we come face to face with the question of a struggle with that country, we have a right to inquire into her history, to measure her strength, and to size up her capability.

Not only has Spain not won a naval battle for over a hundred years, but for that time she has been a source of more trial to her allies than to her enemies. In the history of modern Europe Spain has been a ceaseless care to her friends and of little effect as against her enemies. She has held the Province of Cuba for four hundred years. There is a people of her own blood, unmixed with Indians, the only Spanish-American colony where there has been no mixture, because the Indian was promptly exterminated in the first twenty-five years of its history, according to the general policy of that time. There has grown up this beautiful colony on an island of 50,000 square miles. When the war began, it contained a population of over 1,600,000 people.

Mr. President, one hundred and fifty years ago the Dutch took possession of Java. Java has almost exactly the same number of square miles, almost the same length and general configuration, as Cuba. Both lie in a tropical sea. They produce exactly the same articles—sugar, and coffee, and rice, all the tropical fruits, bananas, pineapples, and so on. But when the Dutch took possession of Java one hundred and fifty years ago, the population was 1,300,000.

To-day under the wise, beneficent, and protective rule of the Dutch, Java supports a population of 34,000,000 people; 34,000,000 people under the fostering care of a Government thousands of miles away; while Cuba, with the same capacity, with the same favorable circumstances, contained but 1,600,000 people, of whom to-day not 1,000,000 are left. This is the fostering care of the mother country. Three thousand miles of heaving brine seems to have engulfed every sentiment of sympathy and protection and interest.

The island has been held to be despoiled. Her people have been shut out from laudable fields of ambition. They have been denied a share of the public offices. They have had no semblance of commune, local self-government. The Captain-General, ever since the office was created, a hundred years ago, has been invested with power more absolute than any king or queen, more autocratic than the Czar of Russia, a power more drastic, more arbitrary and despotic in its exercise, than that exercised by any potentate or prince. From the confines of western Europe, clear across the Asiatic continent to Cape Town, there is not a power so great as his. His decree is law. Nobody questions his decision. He has the power of a general of a city in a state of siege. He confiscates, he slays, and that he has exercised this prerogative without challenge the mournful history of Cuba fully attests.

We have had that ferocious trail of blood running down through all the centuries in the Spanish. Alva, after having boasted that he had slain, outside of battles, sieges, and skirmishes in the "fury of Amsterdam" and the siege of Leyden and other places, more than 18,000 of the Christian Netherlanders, to celebrate the Easter week killed 800 more. Death by burial alive, death by drowning, death by execution of all sorts marked the ferocity of that reign. So it has been continued.

When Alexander Farnese, the greatest general of that century, commanded in the Netherlands, he, too, although imputed a humane man, continued in the same degree the severity of Alva. In all the conquests along the whole of the Pacific and the Atlantic and in South America the same ferocity has obtained on the part of the Spaniard.

What has Spain done to put down the rebellion in Cuba? She has sent more men there than had ever before been sent across the sea by any power on earth. She has sent more men to put down the rebellion in Cuba in three years than she sent to the battle of Lepanto, than she sent with the Grand Armada that was designed to reduce to subjection the Kingdom of England, more than she sent to all her wars and against all her revolted colonies on this continent, more than she sent to the Philippine Islands, and she has sent them against this handful of insurgents. She has sent against them more men than were engaged in all these great enterprises united.

Yet she has failed. Is there anybody so full of hope as to pretend that there can be any success after this miserable failure? Is this thing to be indefinitely prolonged? The Cuban is stubborn; he will resist. Spain is stubborn; she will continue. And are we to sit here and see this contest go on and feed the starving and the hungry and clothe the naked and minister to the relief of all kinds of severity and yet see the cruel work go on?

Mr. President, we have a duty upon us to stop the war. Let it be stopped by negotiation if possible. We have tried that. Let it be armed intervention if necessary. Let the Cubans be supplied by such ships as the Indiana and the Brooklyn with arms and ammunition commensurate with their need, and they will take care of the Spaniards. Let us blockade the ports and the garrison will capitulate. These are things that are to be done if in the wisdom of the Senate and House they think they may be done.

These are the things that to my mind are suggested as all that it is possible for us to do. I despair of negotiation. I have contempt for it in this case. I have seen the fruitlessness and the imbecility of it. I have seen this policy, slow and tortuous, continued while the people have starved to death, while I know if belligerency had been recognized by a proclamation of neutrality these woes and horrors would have had no place in the history of our time.

When, as I stated, Spain has had more men engaged in the conflict than she ever before had engaged in any foreign enterprise, and when we have had two Administrations, representing the two different political parties, when the world knew that war was flagrant in Cuba, that a war was waging, why did they not proclaim that the condition was one of belligerency? That is all that it was necessary to have done. But that day has passed.

Now, the independence of Cuba is a fact that should be recognized. She is independent as far as her civil government is concerned. They enact laws, dispense justice, they hold their courts, they collect their taxes, they have their capital. They do not keep seaports because they have no navy. They do not have garrison towns because that would only waste their strength. Yet they have to-day a government that is capable of being recognized.

How can we recognize that government? The Executive can do it by sending a minister there with the approval of the Senate. The Executive can do it by receiving a minister from Cuba without the consent of the Senate. And the Congress of the United States can do it by passing an act of commercial intercourse in which the President can join with his signature or refuse it, as he sees fit.

These are things that can be done. These are things that are pressing imperatively upon the conscience of this nation. These are things that the American people demand shall be done. They have laid their command upon us and we are their servants. When I speak to-day, I do not speak simply of the thought that arises in me, of the feelings that agitate my mind, but I speak representing a people who believe and have expressed their belief through a memorial of their legislature that we should do all that is possible to free Cuba.

Whether we shall rise to the height of this great occasion is yet to be seen, but I am not one of those who despair. I am a sanguine man. I have confidence in the American Congress. I rely upon the American people. I believe that this is a grand occasion for the exercise of the largest powers of this nation for the sake of Cuba, for the sake of liberty. Let that be done.

People may talk about annexation. It has no place here. That question will settle itself. I do not concern myself about it a moment. But I believe that in the fullness of God's own good time that will come. It will come with the consent of all, and the star that will float singly, scintillant over the plains and hills of Cuba, will be transferred to a larger orbit, to shine with a serener light in the great constellation of American States. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, after the usual morning hour, I shall desire to be heard very briefly, probably not exceeding fifteen or twenty minutes, upon the question of the President's message and the situation in Cuba.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. H. L. OVERSTREET, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 10,000 copies of House Document No. 277, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, entitled Statistics of Lake Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. 1803) for the relief of Joseph P. Patton;

A bill (H. R. 5865) to authorize the Monroe Railway and Construction Company to construct a bridge across Red River at or near Grand Ecore, La.; and

A bill (H. R. 8618) for the relief of the sufferers by the destruction of the U. S. S. Maine in the harbor of Havana, Cuba.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE SIMPKINS.

The message further communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, and transmitted the action of the House thereon.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions just received from the House be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 23, 1898.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS, late Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members of the House be appointed by the Speaker to act with such Senators as may be selected to attend the funeral of the deceased, that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House shall take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased at his home, and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to his memory the House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS, late a Representative from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate under the second resolution, Mr. HOAR, Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. MALLORY.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I move as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 29, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 28, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast been our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble from the beginning of our national life unto the present hour, be Thou our support and guide in the impending crisis. A storm cloud seems to be hovering above us which threatens to break upon us at any moment. Interpose, we beseech Thee, Thy power, that it may pass off, leaving us in peace and tranquillity. Yet, if it must come, in vindication of truth, justice, mercy, and right, help us to be prepared with brain, heart, and brawn to meet it. To this end be with our President and all his counselors, the Congress, and all of our officials connected with the affairs of state, that they may be guided by Thy will.

O Lord, we are called upon once more as a body to mourn the loss of one of our members. Young and strong and promising, taken without a moment's warning, almost, from our midst, be with his colleagues and friends to comfort them. Especially be very near to those who are bound to him by the ties of kinship. Comfort them with the hope that they shall meet again in a land where there shall be no more parting. Hear us, in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

THE MAINE.

The SPEAKER laid the message before the House, and it was read by the Clerk, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

For some time prior to the visit of the Maine to Havana Harbor our consular representatives pointed out the advantages to flow from the visit of national ships to the Cuban waters, in accustoming the people to the presence of our flag as the symbol of good will and of our ships in the fulfillment of the mission of protection to American interests, even though no immediate need therefor might exist.

Accordingly on the 24th of January last, after conference with the Spanish minister in which the renewal of visits of our war vessels to Spanish waters was discussed and accepted, the peninsular authorities at Madrid and Havana were advised of the purpose of this Government to resume friendly naval visits at Cuban ports, and that in that view the Maine would forthwith call at the port of Havana.

This announcement was received by the Spanish Government with appreciation of the friendly character of the visit of the Maine, and with notification of intention to return the courtesy by sending Spanish ships to the principal ports of the United States. Meanwhile the Maine entered the port of Havana on the 25th of January, her arrival being marked with no special incident besides the exchange of customary salutes and ceremonial visits.

The Maine continued in the harbor of Havana during the three weeks following her arrival. No appreciable excitement attended her stay; on the contrary, a feeling of relief and confidence followed the resumption of the long interrupted friendly intercourse. So noticeable was this immediate effect of her visit that the consul-general strongly urged that the presence of our ships in Cuban waters should be kept up by retaining the Maine at Havana, or, in the event of her recall, by sending another vessel there to take her place.

At forty minutes past 9 in the evening of the 15th of February the Maine was destroyed by an explosion, by which the entire forward part of the ship was utterly wrecked. In this catastrophe two officers and two hundred and sixty-four of her crew perished, those who were not killed outright by her explosion being penned between decks by the tangle of wreckage and drowned by the immediate sinking of the hull.

Prompt assistance was rendered by the neighboring vessels anchored in the harbor, aid being especially given by the boats of the Spanish cruiser Alfonso XII and the Ward Line steamer City of Washington, which lay not far distant. The wounded were generously cared for by the authorities of Havana, the hospitals being freely opened to them, while the earliest recovered bodies of the dead were interred by the municipality in a public cemetery in the city. Tributes of grief and sympathy were offered from all official quarters of the island.

The appalling calamity fell upon the people of our country with crushing force, and for a brief time an intense excitement prevailed, which in a community less just and self-controlled than ours might have led to hasty acts of blind resentment. This spirit, however, soon gave way to the calmer processes of reason and to the resolve to investigate the facts and await material proof before forming a judgment as to the cause, the responsibility, and, if the facts warranted, the remedy due. This course necessarily recommended itself from the outset to the Executive, for only in the light of a dispassionately ascertained certainty could it determine the nature and measure of its full duty in the matter.

The usual procedure was followed, as in all cases of casualty or disaster to national vessels of any maritime state. A naval court of inquiry was at once organized, composed of officers well qualified by rank and practical experience to discharge the onerous duty imposed upon them. Aided by a strong force of wreckers and divers, the court proceeded to make a thorough investigation on the spot, employing every available means for the impartial and exact determination of the causes of the explosion. Its operations have been conducted with the utmost deliberation and judgment, and while independently pursued no attainable source of information was neglected, and the fullest opportunity was allowed for a simultaneous investigation by the Spanish authorities.

The finding of the court of inquiry was reached, after twenty-three days of continuous labor, on the 21st of March, instant, and, having been approved on the 22d by the commander-in-chief of the United States naval force on the North Atlantic Station, was transmitted to the Executive.

It is herewith laid before the Congress, together with the voluminous testimony taken before the court.

Its purport is, in brief, as follows:

When the Maine arrived at Havana she was conducted by the regular Government pilot to buoy No. 4, to which she was moored in from 5½ to 6 fathoms of water.

The state of discipline on board and the condition of her magazines, boilers, coal bunkers, and storage compartments are passed in review, with the conclusion that excellent order prevailed and that no indication of any cause for an internal explosion existed in any quarter.

At 8 o'clock in the evening of February 15 everything had been reported secure, and all was quiet.

At forty minutes past 9 o'clock the vessel was suddenly destroyed.

There were two distinct explosions, with a brief interval between them.

The first lifted the forward part of the ship very perceptibly; the second, which was more open, prolonged, and of greater volume, is attributed by the court to the partial explosion of two or more of the forward magazines.

The evidence of the divers establishes that the after part of the ship was practically intact and sank in that condition a very few moments after the explosion. The forward part was completely demolished.

Upon the evidence of a concurrent external cause the finding of the court is as follows:

At frame 17 the outer shell of the ship, from a point 11½ feet from the middle line of the ship and 6 feet above the keel when in its normal position, has been forced up so as to be now about 4 feet above the surface of the water, therefore about 34 feet above where it would be had the ship sunk uninjured.

The outside bottom plating is bent into a reversed V shape (Λ), the after wing of which, about 15 feet broad and 32 feet in length (from frame 17 to frame 25), is doubled back upon itself against the continuation of the same plating, extending forward.

At frame 18 the vertical keel is broken in two and the flat keel bent into an angle similar to the angle formed by the outside bottom plates. This break is now about 6 feet below the surface of the water and about 30 feet above its normal position.

In the opinion of the court this effect could have been produced only by the explosion of a mine situated under the bottom of the ship at about frame 18 and somewhat on the port side of the ship.

The conclusions of the court are:

That the loss of the Maine was not in any respect due to fault or negligence on the part of any of the officers or members of her crew;

That the ship was destroyed by the explosion of a submarine mine, which caused the partial explosion of two or more of her forward magazines; and

That no evidence has been obtainable fixing the responsibility for the destruction of the Maine upon any person or persons.

I have directed that the finding of the court of inquiry and the views of this Government thereon be communicated to the Government of Her Majesty the Queen Regent, and I do not permit myself to doubt that the sense of justice of the Spanish nation will dictate a course of action suggested by honor and the friendly relations of the two Governments.

It will be the duty of the Executive to advise the Congress of the result, and in the meantime deliberate consideration is invoked.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
March 28, 1893.

The SPEAKER. The message will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and printed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that under the rules of the House the message must be referred to the proper committee without debate, but I understood the President to say in his message that he lays before Congress the conclusions of the naval board of inquiry and the testimony. I desire to inquire if that has reached the House?

The SPEAKER. The report and testimony have not reached the House. There is a note attached to the message which was not read by the Clerk. I will read it to the House:

The findings of the court and testimony are sent with the message to the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order now to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of this matter on next Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would not.

DEATH OF HON. JOHN SIMPKINS.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to announce the death of one of the members of the Massachusetts delegation in this House, the Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS. Knowing his admirable qualities, the Massachusetts delegation welcomed him to their number with peculiar pleasure, and the shock of his sudden death comes to us, as I know it does to this House, with peculiar force.

At some future day I shall ask the House to set apart a time when fitting tribute may be paid to his memory.

I ask the Clerk to read the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS, late Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members of the House be appointed by the Speaker to act with such Senators as may be selected to attend the funeral of the deceased; that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House shall take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased at his home, and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to his memory the House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the following committee: Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts, Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts, Mr. COUSINS of Iowa, Mr. FOSS of Illinois, Mr. LITTAUER of New York, Mr. LOVERING of Massachusetts, Mr. NEWLANDS of Nevada, and Mr. BERRY of Kentucky.

In accordance with the resolution, the Chair declares the House to be adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 29, 1898.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, with whom are the issues of life and of death, we stand in Thy presence mourning the departure from earth of an engaging and beloved young member of the House of Representatives, cut off in the very prime and promise of his manhood. Let Thy consolation be granted unto the bereaved members of his family, and especially to his sister, twice orphaned by this great loss.

Likewise we pray that as the Senate pays its tribute of respect and affection to one of its late members, the deceased Senator from South Carolina, the sense of the shortness and uncertainty of human life may rest upon all our hearts. Grant that we may pay heed to the highest and profoundest interests of every human creature, that our peace be made with God, and that we walk before Him in His ordinances and commandments blameless, so that when our hour to depart shall come we may go hence with the testimony of a good conscience, in the communion of the catholic church, and in the confidence of a certain faith in love to Thee, O God, and charity to our fellow-men. We humbly pray through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

On motion of Mr. RAWLINS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

STATISTICS OF LAKE COMMERCE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed by the Public Printer 10,000 copies of House Document No. 277, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, entitled Statistics of Lake Commerce; 4,000 copies for the use of the House, 2,000 copies for the Senate, and 4,000 copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT announced his signature to the following enrolled bills; which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (H. R. 1803) for the relief of Joseph P. Patton;

Mr. GEAR presented a petition of the senate of the State of Iowa, praying that Port Arthur, in the State of Texas, be made a subport of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate resolution.

Whereas lines of railway are now constructed between Port Arthur, Tex., and Kansas City, Mo., and steps are now being taken to extend said lines of railway from Kansas City to central Iowa and points farther north; and

Whereas the building and extension of said lines of railway open to the State of Iowa a new route to the seaboard, and thereby creating competing lines to the railway lines leading to the Atlantic; and

Whereas since the construction of railway lines from Port Arthur, Tex., to Kansas City, Mo., the freight charges between Kansas City and Liverpool, England, have been reduced 33 cents per 100 pounds, the former rate being 79 cents, and since the construction of the railway line between these points it has been reduced to 46 cents, equaling nearly 20 cents upon a bushel of wheat; and

Whereas it is to the interest of the people of Iowa and the great Northwest that Port Arthur, Tex., be made a subport of entry, thus facilitating the exportation and importation of merchandise and freight over competing lines: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Iowa are hereby requested to vote and use all honorable means to make Port Arthur, Tex., a subport of entry, and thus open to the people of Iowa a new and competing route to the seaboard and to the markets of the world.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be requested to mail a copy of these resolutions to the Senators and Members of Congress from Iowa as soon as possible after its adoption.

Mr. GEAR presented a petition of the house of representatives of the State of Iowa, praying that Port Arthur, in the State of Texas, be made a subport of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution.

Whereas the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railway now has its line and connections completed from Port Arthur to Council Bluffs and Keokuk, Iowa, and hopes to reach Des Moines in a short time, their destination being northern Minnesota;

Whereas the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railway have made a large reduction in freight rates, especially on molasses, sugar, lumber, and corn, giving Iowa a new and shorter route to the seaboard at a saving of thousands of dollars in freight;

Whereas the various heads of railway lines now freighting Iowa products to New York, a much longer rail route, hence higher freight rates, are doing all in their power to defeat a bill now before Congress providing for the making of Port Arthur a subport of entry, the same as Sabine Pass now is, so as to cripple what is destined to be Iowa's greatest railroad and their greatest competitor: Therefore,

Be it resolved by this house, That our members in Congress be requested to use all honorable means to secure the passage of the bill making Port Arthur a subport of entry. That the secretary of state be requested to mail a copy of this resolution to each of the Iowa members as soon as possible after its adoption.

I hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was adopted by the house March 18, 1898.

Mr. SPOONER presented a petition of Iron Molders' Union No. 310, of Racine, Wis., praying for the passage of the so-called prison-labor bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of Madison, Wis., and a petition of the Young People's Society of the Christ Presbyterian Church, of Madison, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation to raise the age of protection for girls to 18 years in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Young Men's Christian Association of Madison; of the Emory Lodge of Good Templars, the Primitive Methodist Church, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Mineral Point, and of the Young People's Society of the Christ Presbyterian Church, of Madison, all in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transmission of lottery messages and other gambling matter by telegraph; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of E. E. Street and 39 other citizens of Ashland, Wis., and the petition of C. E. Conklin and 50 other citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the passage of the so-called anti-scalping ticket bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of the First Presbyterian Church of La Crosse; of the Christian Endeavor Society of Sheridan; of the Young People's Society of the Christ Presbyterian Church, of Madison; of the Young Men's Christian Association of Madison; of the Emory Lodge of Good Templars, the Primitive Methodist Church, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Mineral Point, all in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in all Government buildings; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented the petition of Flora H. Casler and 23 other citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in all Government buildings, to prohibit the interstate transmission of lottery messages and other gambling matter by telegraph, and to raise the age of protection for girls to 18 years in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Congregational Church, St. Peter's Church, and the First Baptist Church; of the People's Christian Association, the Baptist Young People's Union, and 109 citizens, all of Fond du Lac, in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of legislation to protect State anti-cigarette laws by providing that cigarettes imported in original packages on entering any State shall become subject to its laws; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON NAVAL AND MILITARY SUPPLIES.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 182) providing for the temporary admission free of duty of naval and military supplies procured abroad, to report it favorably without amendment. I am also directed to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That such guns, ammunition, and other naval and military supplies as may be purchased abroad by this Government for the national defense prior to January 1, 1890, shall be admitted at any port of entry in the United States free of duty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM HENDERSON.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2631) for the relief of the estate of William Henderson, deceased, late of Carroll Parish, La., reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 2631) entitled "A bill for the relief of the estate of William Henderson," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of section 14 of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 4276) to amend the law providing for the police fund and the firemen's relief fund of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4277) for the relief of Charles H. Haswell, late a chief engineer in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 4280) granting a pension to J. O. Scoggins;

A bill (S. 4281) granting a pension to Hiram R. Rhea;

A bill (S. 4282) granting a pension to Mary Franklin;

A bill (S. 4283) granting a pension to Alfred M. Hooper;

A bill (S. 4284) granting an increase of pension to Stephen M. Davis;

A bill (S. 4285) granting a pension to Mary A. Hampton; and

A bill (S. 4286) granting a pension to Marinda Davis.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 4287) increasing the pension of Christopher Denny, of Lebanon, Ind.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 4288) to correct the military record of Patrick Dunphy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 4289) for the relief of Arthur M. Sherman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4290) granting an increase of pension to John Thornton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill (S. 4291) granting a pension to John Magwigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4292) removing the charge of desertion from the name of Charles M. Sollars, of Spokane, Wash.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 4293) granting to the States in which the same are situated the alternate even-numbered sections within the grant to the Union Pacific Railroad Company not heretofore disposed of and to which there is no outstanding claim; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WETMORE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 131) for the relief of the children of John W. Judson, late agent of the United States at Oswego, N. Y., for public works on Lake Ontario; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

Mr. ALLEN. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask to have read at length, and that it lie over for a second reading.

The joint resolution (S. R. 132) recognizing the political independence of the Republic of Cuba, and for other purposes, was read the first time, as follows:

Whereas the war now and for some time past being waged between the Kingdom of Spain and the Cuban insurgents has fully demonstrated the total inability of the former to subdue the insurgents; and

Whereas said war has become one of extermination by starvation, and the dictates of Christian civilization and common humanity alike demand the speedy cessation of hostilities and the immediate termination of the deliberately planned starvation now going on in the Island of Cuba; and

Whereas under existing circumstances it is the bounden duty of the United States of America to intervene; and

Whereas the assertion of the Monroe doctrine forbidding the interference of foreign powers in the affairs of any State or nation on the Western Hemisphere creates an obligation on the part of the United States to guarantee the people thereof against unusual cruelties and barbarities and extermination by any such foreign power; and

Whereas the Cubans have, in the opinion of the American people and of Congress, by their valor and sacrifices during the four years of war, won their independence from Spain and are entitled to political recognition by the United States; and

Whereas it is apparent that Spain can no longer govern or control the people of Cuba: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Republic of Cuba, now and for some time maintained by force of arms, is hereby recognized by the United States of America as a separate and independent nation. That the United States shall immediately intervene and put an end to the war now being waged on the Island of Cuba and shall succor and release from imprisonment the people there concentrated for the purpose of starvation and extermination; and

Be it further resolved, That for the purpose of enabling the President of the United States to provide the concentrated noncombatant Cubans with the necessary food, raiment, and medicine for their immediate relief from starvation, the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. RAWLINS. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read at length and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. R. 133) recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba and declaring war against the Kingdom of Spain was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the war waged by the Kingdom of Spain against the people of Cuba has destroyed the commerce between them and the people of the United States, and its revival will be impossible so long as such war may continue; and

Whereas by the authority of that Kingdom, in the course of such war, much American property has been destroyed and many American citizens, without just cause, have been imprisoned and some assassinated in their prison cells; and

Whereas, while our ship Maine was at anchor in the harbor of Havana, within the dominion and under the control of the Kingdom of Spain, at a place designated by her authority, that ship and most of the men on board in the service of their country, by the explosion of a submarine mine, were willfully, wickedly, and treacherously mangled and destroyed; and

Whereas the Kingdom of Spain has proven herself incompetent to tranquillize the Island of Cuba, either by the methods of peace or by means of civilized warfare, and accordingly has proceeded to make desolate the homes of its peaceful inhabitants, driving men, women, and children into guarded camps, detaining them there without making provision to shelter, clothe, or feed them, thus willfully causing their extermination to the number of hundreds of thousands by the slow and torturous process of starvation; and

Whereas against these wrongs, against these revolting acts of inhumanity, this Government has time and again made peaceful protest to the Kingdom of Spain, at the same time endeavoring by a helpful charity to relieve those whom she has thus brought to such dire distress, and our repeated protests having been disregarded, and our efforts of philanthropy having proved unavailing; and

Whereas, firmly convinced that further peaceful protest will prove equally in vain and that the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Cuba and armed intervention in its behalf by this Government will alone be effective for the redress of past and the prevention of future wrongs; and

Whereas, while regretting the necessity now imperious for such action, but mindful of our duty to a neighboring people and to humanity, and with a clear consciousness as to the justness of our cause and that our action will meet with the approving judgment of all civilized peoples: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the independence of the Republic of Cuba be, and the same is hereby, recognized, and that war against the Kingdom of Spain be, and the same is hereby, declared, and the President is hereby authorized and directed to employ the land and naval forces of the United States of America to wage such war to success.

Mr. FORAKER. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it may be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 134) recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba and providing for intervention by the United States, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

1. That the people of the Island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

2. That the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful government of that island.

3. That the war Spain is waging against Cuba is so destructive of the commercial and property interests of the United States, and so cruel, barbarous, and inhuman in its character as to make it the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States hereby does demand, that she at once withdraw her land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

4. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, empowered, and directed to use, if necessary, the entire land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the joint resolution may be sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have no purpose at this time to ask the indulgence of the Senate that I may discuss the resolution, but I do want to say now that at an early day I shall hope to have that privilege and be able at that time to show that the joint resolution ought to be passed by the Senate.

I wish to say now, however, that the joint resolution has been long delayed. I intended to introduce it or an equivalent resolution at the beginning of the present session of Congress, in December last. I delayed offering it at that time because of the character of message the President sent us in regard to the Cuban question. That message, as I understood it in common with the people of the whole country, gave us a promise that after a reasonable time of trial for autonomy and promised reforms, if autonomy should fail and reforms not be instituted, this Government would take such action as might be appropriate to put an end to a war which the people of the United States feel, I think I may say almost unanimously, it is our duty to put an end to.

Weeks and months passed. The time came when it was demonstrated to all that autonomy had failed, that no reforms had been instituted, that our duty remained the same. I was then about to introduce this joint resolution in order that action might be taken, but it was again delayed, because just at that moment we had the De Lôme incident. Before the De Lôme incident was fairly closed we had another incident—the Maine incident—and ever since we have been waiting on a report from the board of inquiry charged with the duty of investigating that disaster. The report is at last before us. It has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have no disposition now to discuss it, but I offer the resolution now because as that branch of this subject is taken up we may also take up this other branch of it, for whatever may be done with respect to the Maine, treated as an incident by itself, if it should be so treated, we will have the Cuban question as a general question recurring, and this resolution is addressed to the Cuban question generally.

This much I desired to say, and that is all at this time. At an early day, as I have said, I desire to discuss this question on its merits.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, it was not my intention to introduce a joint resolution this morning, but as two have already been presented and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I submit a joint resolution and ask its reference to the same committee.

The joint resolution (S. R. 135) directing and empowering the President, in his discretion, to terminate, by intervention, the hostilities between Spain and the people of Cuba, and in favor of the independence of said people, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the war which has been waged in the Island of Cuba for the past three years has been conducted by the Spanish Government in violation of the rules of civilized warfare; said Government has driven the unarmed and peaceable inhabitants from their homes and forced them within the armed camps, where it has permitted hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children to die of starvation, and as a result of this system of inhuman warfare tens of thousands of the helpless people are now dying for want of food; and

Whereas the war has paralyzed and almost destroyed the large commercial relations which have heretofore existed between the United States and Cuba, and has rendered useless and brought to ruin the many millions of dollars of property of American citizens invested in the islands; and

Whereas the existence and prolongation of the hostilities have imposed

heavy financial expenditures and burdensome official labors upon the Government of the United States in the enforcement of its neutrality laws; and

Whereas the consuls of the United States and other impartial and competent observers have reported that the Spanish Government has lost control of much of the greater portion of the territory of the island; that it is powerless to restore its authority and bring about peace; and that a continuance of the contest will have no other effect than to increase the horrors, misery, and starvation which now exist, to utterly extinguish the commerce with and destroy the property of American citizens, and add to the expense and burdens of the Government of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed and empowered to take such effective steps as, in his discretion, may be necessary to secure a speedy termination of the hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba, the withdrawal of the military and naval forces of Spain from said island, and the complete independence of said people.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let all these resolutions be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. All of them?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Joint resolutions are printed under the rule.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment relative to printing on envelopes, intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment relative to the presentation of accounts for telegraphic services rendered the United States, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit an amendment relative to the deepening of the channel and the establishment of a dry dock at Round Bay, in the State of Maryland, and an amendment relative to the purchase of property in the city of Annapolis, Md., for the use of the United States Naval Academy, intended to be proposed by me to the naval appropriation bill, which I move be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I also present two memorials of the mayor, counselor, and aldermen of the city council of Annapolis, Md., in reference to the same matter, which I move be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and printed as documents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment relative to indemnity lands granted for educational purposes, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM W. LEAKE.

Mr. MALLORY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That Senate bill No. 4012, entitled "A bill for the relief of William W. Leake, of Kissimmee, Fla.," be, and is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims of the United States, under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act, for a finding of the facts as provided by the act of March 3, 1883, designated as the Bowman Act.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN CUBA.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if in his opinion it is not inconsistent with the public interests, to inform the Senate of the number of American citizens, native or adopted, that have received in Cuba the assistance of the United States from the sum of $50,000 appropriated by Congress for that purpose. And that he will inform the Senate whether the distribution of said appropriation has been necessary to save the lives of said citizens, or any of them.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 26th instant approved and signed the act (S. 2308) granting the right to the Omaha Northern Railway Company to construct a railway across, and establish stations on, the Omaha and Winnebago reservations, in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MASON rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the fact that yesterday I asked unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the Private Pension Calendar at the conclusion of the routine morning business. I observe that the Vice-President in stating the request made it at 1 o'clock. I shall very graciously yield to the Senator from Illinois if he can assure me that there will be an opportunity to get to the Calendar of private pension bills between the conclusion of his remarks and 2 o'clock, at which time a special order is to be enforced.

Mr. MASON. I shall be very glad to give the Senator that assurance. I shall not occupy over twenty-five minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood that the Senator was not going to occupy much time, and I yield to him for the purpose of delivering his address.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I do not intend in the brief statement I make to-day to forestall or in any way affect the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which has been referred the President's message and the accompanying report and evidence. We are invited by the President at the close of his message to deliberately consider the situation, and it is only fair to the committee, my colleagues, and my constituents that they should know, and as soon as possible, the general expression and intention of the members of this body. I wish to be understood, I am not apologizing for taking the floor at this time, but I intend no disrespect either to the Administration or to the committee when I say that I am tired of the dilatory tactics that have been employed for three years to prevent any assistance from the United States to the starving and struggling Cubans.

More than two years ago the plan of the Spanish Government to starve the women and children and noncombatants was begun. Every intelligent man, woman, and child was informed of it through the ordinary channels of information—the newspapers—and by the statements of disinterested witnesses day after day, week after week, month after month, and year after year at our very door, and received practically no attention from this Government until some of the members of this body visited the scene of death and distress and brought back to us their words of honor that no picture had been drawn by the press that fully stated the horrors of the situation. Then the gentlemen and newspapers who had pretended, at least, to discredit those statements in this body, began to talk about it as though it was a new discovery, when within 90 miles of our shore for two years they had continued to murder women and children.

When nearly a year ago I called attention to the situation, as given at that time, and since corroborated by four of our colleagues upon this floor from personal observation, the statement was received with sneers by many of my colleagues, and I had the pleasure of being insulted over the wire by stock brokers and scalpers in the markets. For two years the process of imprisonment of the reconcentrados and their starvation has proceeded, yet anyone who dared to call attention to the fact has had to withstand the assaults of those controlling the press, who denied in their editorial columns the news they printed in their news columns. Thousands had been starved, millions of dollars of our legitimate commerce has been swept from the high seas, and the man who worships the eagle on the dollar and does not see the one on his flag, says, "Be silent; think of the horrors of war and the dangers to business."

When the order of concentration came they cooped up at least 800 American citizens with the reconcentrados and refused to allow them to go out and earn a legitimate and honest living. It amounted to imprisonment. We claimed so at the time, yet many professed not to believe it, until the honorable Senator from Vermont described the dead line and the gun of the Spanish soldier that kept the reconcentrados together.

Any other self-respecting nation in the world would have ordered their release and better treatment, or they would have opened the gates of hell on Morro Castle. This Government, however, upon the suggestion of the President, took $50,000 of the people's money out of the Treasury of the United States and begged of Spain the poor privilege of feeding our citizens American bread on Spanish soil.

I am not complaining. I am not criticising. There is no other such record in all the history of the world. I only repeat this humiliating statement to call attention to the fact that every effort that has been made by the President has been construed by Spain to be an act of cowardice and absolute and conclusive evidence that we are afraid of that mighty power, and every such act of careful consideration on our part has made Spain more cruel to her own people and more insulting to us.

We should have had before our minds the message of the first great President, who left word, in substance, that if we did not wish a national insult we should resent it. I beg to read from the fifth annual address of President Washington. He said:

> I can not recommend to your notice measures for the fulfillment of our duties to the rest of the world without again pressing upon you the necessity of placing ourselves in a condition of complete defense and of exacting from them the fulfillment of their duties toward us. * * * There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld if not absolutely lost by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war.

If the spirit had animated us two years ago that animated the first President when he penned those words, we would never have been placed in the humiliating situation of taking money from the American Treasury to feed American citizens who are in the prisons of the Spaniards. We would have demanded, as England or any other self-respecting nation, that the citizens of our country should have a right to proceed upon the Island of Cuba to earn a legitimate living. Our failure to respect ourselves has given us what was promised by the Father of his Country, the insults we have invited.

The battle ship Maine, our gallant ship, went down and 268 of our brave citizen sailors with her. At the time every citizen of the United States familiar with the Spanish character felt confident it was Spanish treachery. Our ship was there by right of custom, of tendered hospitality, and also by treaty contract she had an absolute right to be there. The day closed, and she rode the harbor a messenger of peace. No message had been sent by our Executive inconsistent with the national honor of Spain. Our only offer was to try and restore peace, alike honorable to all.

Our Treasury had been opened to feed our people. Definite plans were not even suggested by the President, fearing to injure our relations with Spain. Spain could not conquer her own insurgents. Had we been a grasping nation, we could at any time within two years have made aggressive and forcible annexation, taking advantage of the crimes of Spain and the misfortune of Cuba.

"The night came on—a dark, a gloomy night, a natural and proper time for Spanish bravery! The remarkable part of Spanish history has been made in the night. Our men were asleep in a friendly harbor. They were never challenged to try their courage. They were not whipped in honorable battle, but choked, burned, strangled, and drowned without a chance to die fighting for life, without a moment to say a prayer. In the twinkling of an eye they stood in the presence of their Maker.

Suppose ninety of them had been United States Senators. Suppose the balance had been Members of Congress, or made up of judges and leading professional and business men; would forty days have elapsed before war began? Or suppose each Senator had a son or brother there! Do we tell our children the truth when we say that the life of every American citizen is of equal value before the law? They were not Senators; they were sailors. Their widows and orphans cry aloud to us. The silent appeal of 268 seamen comes to us again and again, saying to the Congress of the nation, "We are flesh of your flesh, bone of your bone, and blood of your blood. We loved and died for the flag that shields you." What is to be our answer? Shall we answer with money, Mr. President? I speak only for myself, and I am for war. [Applause in the galleries.]

But gentlemen may say, "Do not say you are for war; say that you are for armed intervention," which means war. I believe in calling things by their right names. If we believe that murdering our men, sinking our ship, and lowering our flag is not cause for war, say so; and refer it as they did the Virginius affair, and allow our brothers to be sold like cattle for gold.

If it is a cause for war, let us assume the responsibility put upon us by the Constitution, and say so not only to Spain, but to the whole world. Let us not say one thing and mean another. For God's sake, Mr. President, let us not Spanishize our diplomacies, but rather speak the truth and prove ourselves to be American citizens and worthy disciples of James G. Blaine.

We can hide no longer under the Executive wing. He can neither declare war nor refuse it. Congress alone can declare war. I for one am ready to vote now. You may continue to cry "Peace! peace!" but there can be no peace while Europeans own and butcher their slaves on the same continent where our flag floats.

But there are those who say that the court does not fix the responsibility. It was not necessary. The "peace at any price" man can not escape so. The law fixes the responsibility. We were in Spanish waters and over Spanish soil. The harbor is owned, controlled, and patrolled by Spain. The explosives in that harbor were owned and controlled by Spain. If it was a torpedo, it was a Spanish torpedo; if it was a mine, it was a Spanish mine. No explosives have been on sale in Havana for over a year to private citizens. By section 4 of Weyler's proclamation it was a crime to buy, sell, or have possession of explosives. If it was gun cotton, it was Spanish gun cotton, and if it was dynamite, it was Spanish dynamite. The power to explode it was controlled by Spain as much as they controlled the discharge of their cannon. A Government acts only through its agents and officers. It was owned, located, and exploded by Spain, and Spain must answer.

Mr. President, I have not made this statement without due deliberation. We have had more than forty days to deliberate. If it had been the boat of any live business man, its owner would have had a report within ten days. I am not complaining. I can not hope to escape criticism, but I shall not criticise. If ever there was a time when we should be open, frank, and considerate of each other, the time is now. I am willing to be governed by the wish of a majority of my friends who sit upon this floor. I claim no monopoly on patriotism; I claim no monopoly on love of humanity; I bring here no pretense of infallible judgment. I desire to work in harmony for the honor and glory of this country with the Executive and with Congress.

This is the only war-making power of this nation. I am only one of many, and it is fair to you and my constituents that I make my views known now. I shall oppose any proposition looking to indemnity. We must provide for the widows and orphans of our seamen, and their hands should never be soiled with Spanish coin. As I refuse to make a cash settlement for the lives of our men, I shall, with all the strength God gives me, bitterly and to the end oppose making a mere diplomatic incident out of the murder of our citizens.

I shall oppose the annexation of Cuba. I have given my reasons for that before. I think it would add to the glory of all Christendom if we, the mother of republics, make this fitting close of the century. We have been outraged and insulted. We demand neither money nor territory for the healing of our wounds. We only demand that the yellow Spanish flag shall retire forever from the Island of Cuba.

I shall oppose any plan to assist Spain to place any kind of autonomy on Cuba. Spain can not be trusted to keep her promise, and we can not undertake to compel her to do so. Aside from that, poor Cuba has paid a larger price for liberty than we did, and she must be free.

I shall oppose any plan that looks to forcing Cuba in the future to pay Spain one cent in cash for her liberty. Her land is full of graves, and her future generations must not be mortgaged. It is claimed by some that Cuba ought to be willing to pay the Spanish-Cuban war debt; that is, that Cuba should at least contribute to Spain the money Spain has spent in trying to destroy Cuba.

Shall Cuba pay for the powder and lead that killed her people? Shall Cuba pay for the torches that burned her homes? Shall she pay the back wages of the Spanish soldiers who ravished her wives and daughters? Never by any vote of mine, Mr. President!

Some tell us we must wait for Spanish elections. If her elections are as rotten as her diplomacies, we had better not wait. It is claimed that if we will wait until the Spanish elections Sagasta will give all concessions. Mr. President, are we to be fooled twice with the same trick? Is De Lôme so soon forgotten? Some tell us we are not prepared. When, then, shall we be better prepared? Will it be when the Spanish torpedo flotilla has crossed the water and rests complacently on her base of supplies, within striking distance of our fleet? We know now officially what we have believed for forty days. Shall we wait until she can destroy more of our ships and men? God forbid that such a crime should be charged to us.

Let us awake, Mr. President; shake off the Chinese narcotic that locks us in drowsy indolence, as we hug our money bags and murmur, "Peace at any price;" awake as our fathers did at Concord and Bunker Hill; awake to glorious war against a nation that burns homes and murders women and children; awake to glorious war that seeks no gain for us in treasure or territory, but a war to drive the oppressor from the continent, to set the Cuban flag in the sky forever, and, following the instructions, almost divine, left by Washington, a war that will give notice everywhere that the flag of our country and the lives of American citizens shall be honored and respected all over the world. [Applause in the galleries.]

EXPOSITION OF AMERICAN PRODUCTS AT PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask, Mr. President, that the agreement which was reached on yesterday as to the consideration of pension bills be now executed.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will yield to me for a few moments in order that I may ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 4080) providing for a national exposition of American products and manufactures at the city of Philadelphia for the encouragement of the export trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. That bill seems to be a matter of great concern to the people of Pennsylvania, and I will gladly yield if it does not lead to discussion.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand there will be no discussion on the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HAWLEY. Owing to the confusion in the Chamber, I have heard nothing but fragments of the reading of the bill. My attention had not been called to it before. May I ask if this is a bill providing for the holding of an international exposition?

Mr. PENROSE. The exposition will be partly international, but chiefly national.

Mr. HAWLEY. After the manner of the Omaha and New Orleans expositions?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is there any expenditure on the part of the Government connected with it?

Mr. PENROSE. There is an expenditure of $300,000 provided for in the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill has been reported from a committee, I suppose?

Mr. PENROSE. It has been, and here is the report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not care for the reading of the report.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill has been very carefully considered by the Committee on Commerce, which has made an elaborate report on the subject.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not care to make objection.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION CASES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the first case on the Pension Calendar be now taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Private Pension Calendar is before the Senate.

JOHN GREEN.

The bill (S. 1183) for the relief of John Green was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in adjudicating the pension claim of John Green, late of Troop C, Fourth United States Cavalry, to accept disability as having been incurred in line of duty, and thereupon to place the name of said John Green on the pension roll, subject to all other provisions and limitations of the pension laws, such pension, when granted, to date from the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the preamble be stricken from the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MAJ. MOSES CHAPMAN.

The bill (S. 3542) granting a pension to Maj. Moses Chapman was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill has been reported adversely. Let it be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ELISHA M. LUCKETT.

The bill (H. R. 1381) granting an increase of pension to Elisha M. Luckett was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension roll the name of Elisha M. Luckett, second lieutenant Company B, Second Pennsylvania Volunteers, Mexican war, and to pay him a pension of $25 per month, in lieu of the pension now drawn by him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. EMMA V. GILE.

The bill (S. 2652) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Emma V. Gile was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma V. Gile, widow of the late George W. Gile, colonel Eighty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry, and brevet brigadier-general volunteers, and colonel, United States Army, retired, at the rate of $30 per month, to be paid to her from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension which she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Emma V. Gile."

BARBARA MILLER.

The bill (H. R. 3212) granting an increase of pension to Barbara Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Barbara Miller, widow of John Miller, late of Company C, One hundred and forty-second Regiment New York Infantry, on the pension roll and to pay her a pension of $12 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA E. HUDDLESTON.

The bill (S. 2786) granting a pension to Martha E. Huddleston was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Martha E. Huddleston, widow of Pinkney Huddleston, of Company I, First Battalion Second Arkansas Volunteers, or mounted gun men, in the Sabine disturbances in the Southwest in 1836 and 1837, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Manifestly the pension provided for in this bill should have been at the rate of $8 per month, that being the rate granted under the Indian pension laws. I move that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

And to pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN R. BEVAN.

The bill (S. 3169) granting a pension to John R. Bevan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of John R. Bevan, stepfather of Edward L. Bowden, deceased, late private in Company G, First Maine Regiment Heavy Artillery Volunteers, at $12 a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS LANE.

ALONZO B. CHATFIELD.

The bill (S. 4003) to construe an act approved June 3, 1884, rerating and including the disability of Alonzo B. Chatfield, late of Company B, Thirty-third Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the act approved June 3, 1884, "rerating and including the disability of Alonzo B. Chatfield, late of Company B, Thirty-third Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, with that class of pensioners who have lost an arm at or above the elbow," be construed to be continuous in its provision; and the Commissioner of Pensions is instructed to reenter and continue the name of that pensioner on the roll with the class mentioned in the act, and at the rate of pension provided for that class.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the committee, whether this is not a bill which grants arrears of pensions, practically?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say it was not so intended, and if there is any question about it, I wish the Senator from Missouri would offer an amendment making it plain that it does not.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it does, beyond any question.

Mr. GALLINGER. It ought not to grant arrears, and if the Senator will prepare an amendment, I shall be glad to have it adopted.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to insert at the end of the bill the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES B. RAWLINS.

The bill (H. R. 6931) granting a pension to James B. Rawlins was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "sixteen;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of James B. Rawlins, son of the late Maj. Gen. John A. Rawlins, and pay him a pension of $16 a month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that part of the report on the first page, beginning "the proposed beneficiary of this bill," be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read from the report submitted by Mr. KYLE, from the Committee on Pensions, March 22, 1898, as follows:

The proposed beneficiary of this bill, "little Jimmie," as he was familiarly called, was always an invalid, and early, at the age of 18 months, subject to epilepsy, which impaired and ruined his originally bright mind and rendered him unable to carry on any business or to support himself. He is now poor, without any income or property whatever, and unable to help himself. He is an object not only of charity, but of pity. He has no friends or relatives able to care for him. His case is within the spirit and purpose of the law, but not within the letter, and the Pension Bureau is without power to grant relief.

Your committee, in view of these facts, are unanimously of the opinion that the relief sought ought to be granted, and report the bill back with the recommendation that it pass, with the following amendment:

In line 6 strike out "thirty" and insert "sixteen."

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to say a word and to ask the Senate not to concur in the amendment made by the committee. This boy is the son of Gen. John A. Rawlins, who was a personal friend of mine. I happen to know that the boy, since he was taken away from here, has become absolutely blind. He is having almost every day the spells referred to in the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Epileptic fits?

Mr. CULLOM. Epileptic fits. His sister is a very poor woman, a married woman with scarcely any property of her own. The boy is absolutely helpless. I hope if the Senate or Congress is disposed to give the boy anything that the committee will kindly allow the bill to go through at $30.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am aware of the fact that it is always an ungracious thing to reduce the rate of pension allowed to any claimant who is properly championed by a member of the Senate or House of Representatives. My judgment is that this bill ought not to pass at all. That is my judgment. It proposes to grant a pension to the son of a soldier, and we are not pensioning the children of soldiers unless they have been incapacitated from infancy. Undoubtedly this young man has had some disability from early life, but the fact is that for a time, and that in recent years, he performed service in one of the Departments in Washington. This is the first time it has been hinted to me that he is totally blind. I never heard that fact suggested before. It does not appear in the report.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a letter, which I have not in my possession, however, stating that since the boy was taken home to his sister he can scarcely see the light at all. He was partly blind when taken away from here, and he has now become blind. Besides he is being supported now by the John A. Rawlins Post, of this city. It seems to me if we are going to give him anything at all, we ought to give him enough so that we can fairly well take care of him. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the committee, who I know is guarding the interests of the Treasury as carefully as possible, will withdraw any opposition to the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to make an additional observation. In the case of children of private soldiers who have been incapacitated from infancy we have established a rate of $12 per month, and I know of no reason why the son of a major-general should have a higher rate of pension, when it is a gratuity, than the son of a private soldier. Yet in view of the fact that General Rawlins was conspicuous in the service and that there is great sympathy felt for this poor boy, if the Senate wishes to nonconcur in the amendment reported by the committee, I have no objection.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senate will nonconcur in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, before the word "dollars," strike out "thirty" and insert "sixteen."

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand this case—and I had that part of the report read for the purpose of understanding it—it is parallel with the general law. Where a child from infancy is idiotic or insane or totally disabled, the Commissioner of Pensions can grant a pension; but this not having been such a case absolutely from infancy, the Pension Office could not act upon it. The evidence presented and the statement of the Senator from Illinois bring the case within the spirit of the law.

Mr. CULLOM. I want to say one word further. The chairman of the committee referred to this young man as having been employed in Government service for a while. The truth is he was put there as a matter of pity to try to support him, but he was so utterly helpless that he was unable to perform duty. Finally he was stricken almost entirely blind, and he was taken out. He lay here quite a long time very ill, and then he was taken home to his sister by the Army post here, where he has been quite ill ever since. The chances are that he will live but a little while longer.

Mr. GALLINGER. A single further observation. My anxiety is not about this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that.

Mr. GALLINGER. My anxiety is about the flood of bills that are coming to Congress to pension children of soldiers. I want to give notice now that if we do not call a halt in that matter, we have got to face the proposition in Congress to pension all the children of soldiers as well as the widows of soldiers. I am here trying to guard the Treasury. It is an ungracious task. Sometimes I almost despair of any reasonable degree of success. It seems to me that human ingenuity is being tested to its utmost to devise reasons for asking for private pension legislation.

I simply want to put myself on record as desiring to have meritorious bills passed, stretching my conviction to the utmost extent in all cases of destitution. I shall not oppose the passage of the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to say simply that I heartily concur in the statement of the chairman of the committee. The pressure is intense for an increase of all classes of pensions, and doubtless there will be many cases where children of soldiers will claim pensions. We have established a principle in regard to children, and beyond the spirit of that law Congress ought never to go. If I thought this case was beyond the real spirit of the law, I should say no to it, and that the bill should not even be passed at all. But as it was brought clearly within the spirit of the law, I do not propose to offer any objection to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will let the amendment be nonconcurred in so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FARNHAM J. EASTMAN.

The bill (S. 1353) for the increase of pension of Farnham J. Eastman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Farnham J. Cook, widow of Lewis G. Cook, deceased, late mate and acting master in United States Navy, at the rate of $20 per month, in lieu of her present pension of $12 per month, under certificate No. 2210.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out the word "deceased," in line 6.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER (at 1 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.). There is a special order for 2 o'clock, the matter of eulogies upon the late Senator Earle, of South Carolina. It will take about fifteen minutes to complete the Pension Calendar, and I appeal to the senior Senator from South Carolina to grant the courtesy to the committee to occupy fifteen minutes after 2 o'clock.

Mr. TILLMAN. Under the circumstances I do not feel inclined to make any objection to that request, and it may be granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the request is granted.

R. A. BROWNING.

The bill (H. R. 2924) granting an increase of pension to R. A. Browning was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of R. A. Browning, late a private in Company I, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Volunteers (Mexican war), from $12 to $20 per month.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan C. Oden, widow of Alfred Oden, a soldier in Captain Mace's volunteer company of Missouri Rangers during the time of the Blackhawk Indian war, and pay her a pension of $8 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DELIA ELIZABETH WOODWARD.

The bill (H. R. 3915) granting a pension to Delia Elizabeth Woodward was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Delia Elizabeth Woodward, widow of George Nelson Morgan, who served as major First Minnesota Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $25 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS M. BRUNER.

The bill (H. R. 3802) increasing the pension of Francis M. Bruner was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Francis M. Bruner, late a member of Company A, Seventh United States Colored Infantry, on the pension roll and to pay him a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. G. ENGLISH.

The bill (H. R. 7008) granting pension to R. G. English was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension roll at $8 per month R. G. English, who served in the war known as the Sabine Indian disturbances.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2295) granting a pension to Mary J. Hart, of Quincy, Ind.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 504) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Christine C. Barnard, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. STALLINGS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 199) to postpone the opening of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation in the State of Utah; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR EARLE.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The resolutions submitted by the Senator from South Carolina will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOSEPH HAYNESWORTH EARLE, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina, and that it extends to his afflicted family its sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

Resolved further, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of Senator EARLE the legislative business of the Senate be now suspended in order that his associates in this body may pay a tribute to his memory.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit to the family of the deceased certified copies of these resolutions, with statement of the action of the Senate thereon.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further testimonial to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as by agreement my colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN] will present a brief outline of the life and services of the dead Senator from South Carolina, I ask that he be first recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the junior Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, to offer tributes of respect to one of our number who died while in the discharge of his official duties is one of the most kindly and time-honored customs of Congress. These constantly recurring exercises are eloquent reminders of the shortness and uncertainty of life, and they touch a sympathetic cord in human nature which even the sternest can not repel.

The philosophy and religion of every age and every clime have conspired to rob of its terrors the cold, clammy atmosphere of the grave, and it is some comfort to believe that after we have crossed the Dark River we shall be remembered and loved by those who remain on this side. One of the unseen evidences which points to immortality is the instinctive desire of men to be remembered by those left behind; to be thought of and talked about by the living after we are dead. It is this desire which makes the philanthropist more generous, the soldier more brave, the adventurous more daring, the wise more learned, and the good more just. An all-wise Providence planted this longing within our breasts to urge humanity to its utmost effort and to impress upon our vain natures the immeasurable distance that lies between the highest accomplishments of man and the grandeur and majesty of the infinite.

There is a time to mourn as well as a time to die. May this custom continue in the future, as in the past, a token of love and respect to the virtues of our colleagues who have passed away.

As a citizen of his native State and his successor in this honorable body, I bring my tribute of admiration and respect to the memory of the late Senator JOSEPH H. EARLE. If the honest promptings of my heart would suffice, the green sod of kindly memory would ever flourish above his grave.

Senator JOSEPH H. EARLE was born April 30, 1847, the youngest of a family of nine children. His father, a wealthy and distinguished lawyer, and his mother, an estimable and accomplished lady, both died before he was 5 years old. The ample fortune left him by his father was lost through a reckless guardian, and at a tender age he was thrown out in the world an orphan without means.

Senator EARLE traced his genealogy through a long line of distinguished ancestors, both in this country and in England. Many of them served with marked distinction during the Revolutionary war, and since that time have been distinguished as politicians, judges, lawyers, and teachers. It is a family which has always possessed much influence and consideration, especially in the Piedmont region of South Carolina. Fortunately for the little orphan boy, he was taken in charge by an aunt, a most excellent woman, who reared him with much care. He attended school at Sumter, S. C., and soon evinced a decided aptitude for study and a strong determination to become a scholar.

In July, 1864, he enlisted in "Charles Battery," which at the close of the war was part of Kemper's Artillery, and later on surrendered with Johnston's army. He attained the rank of sergeant, and, boy that he was, discharged the full duty of a soldier. At the close of the war he went to Furman University for two years, and taught school and paid for his tuition afterwards. During these years his independent spirit felt the grinding force of poverty. Anxious for an education and fully appreciating its value, he was unable to complete his course at college for the want of a little ready money.

He was very thorough in his studies and nearly always stood at the head of his class. After leaving college he was elected principal of the Chick Springs Academy in 1868 and conducted the school with credit to himself and satisfaction to the community. While teaching here he began the study of law and was admitted to the bar in 1870. In 1869 he located for the practice of law in Anderson, having married Miss Annie Wilton Earle, daughter of John Baylis Earle, a wealthy and influential citizen of that county. In 1875 he removed to Sumter, where he soon acquired a large and remunerative practice.

The year 1876 will ever remain a marked period in the history of South Carolina. It was a time which tried the manhood, courage, and constancy of every white man in the State. It is in times like these that men of true courage and ability come to the front. Without effort, almost, upon his part he became the leader of the people of Sumter County. He was chosen in 1878 to the house of representatives, declined a renomination in 1880, but in 1882 was elected to the State senate for four years. As a legislator he acquitted himself with rare ability, and soon became one of the prominent figures in public life. In 1886 Judge EARLE was elected attorney-general, and having succeeded to the same office so soon after him, I can speak with authority of the marked ability and fidelity with which he discharged its arduous duties.

Soon after the end of his second term as attorney-general he removed from Sumter to Greenville, forming a copartnership under the name of Earle, Orr & Mooney. Probably the most marked event in the public life of Senator EARLE was his campaign for governor in 1890.

The period from 1885 to 1890 had been one of unrest and political agitation among the people of South Carolina. The wounds have not all healed and there are still smoldering embers, which it is needless to stir into an angry blaze by tracing too particularly the causes leading up to and the history of those stormy days. I may say, however, that the immediate differences were the demand for an agricultural college, better common-school facilities, primary elections, reduction of governmental expenses, and the equalization of taxation.

The recognized leader of the "Farmers' Movement," as it was called, was Capt. B. R. TILLMAN, now a member of this body. In addition to local issues the Alliance agitation in the agricultural States of the South and West was particularly strong in South Carolina. In 1890 we had the first State campaign for the control of the nominating convention. In March of that year the Farmers' Movement held a convention and suggested Capt. B. R. Tillman for governor, subject to the action of the State convention. This made a clear-cut issue and resulted in the formation of two well-defined factions within the Democratic party, who fought for supremacy just as political parties do in the general election in other States. One faction was known as the "Tillmanites" or "Reformers" and the other as "Conservatives or Antis."

The Conservatives made no regular nomination, but by tacit consent General EARLE received their support. He was just closing his career as attorney-general, and was favorably known throughout the State as an able lawyer and a pure, incorruptible man. A forcible speaker, with a fine presence and a clean public and private record, he was, in my opinion, the strongest man the Conservatives could have run. While identified with that faction, he was popular with the Reformers, for indeed they had practically offered him the nomination for governor in 1888 against Richardson.

The campaign of 1890 constitutes an epoch in the history of South Carolina and in truth marks a political revolution in our State. It was a memorable canvass. EARLE, polished and elegant in manner, spoke with the logic and clearness of a trained lawyer, but he had not the rugged force and fiery eloquence with which his opponent stirred the masses of the people to a pitch of enthusiasm not witnessed in our State during this generation. Factional feeling, intense before the campaign opened, became more so as it progressed.

From the first it was plainly evident that a great popular wave was sweeping the State from the mountains to the sea. Vast crowds attended every public meeting, and General EARLE was confronted by immense audiences, which evinced by every means in their power a preference for his opponent. In these public contests it is easy to float on the crest of a tidal wave. The battle is not to be dreaded when the chances are something like equal, but the true test comes when a man faces certain defeat for a cause which he believes to be just, and still fights with the same ardor and courage as though he stood any chance of winning.

General EARLE, true to hereditary instincts, faced the storm with coolness and magnificent self-possession, and he met defeat with the courage and dignity of true manhood. No one, under the circumstances, could have done better than he did. In defeat he had the respect of both friend and foe, as after events amply proved. After the election, so high had factional feeling run that a large number refused to abide the result of the primary and nominated an independent ticket, headed by Judge Haskell. The campaign had been intensely bitter, and Judge Haskell was very popular among the Conservatives. He was a man of high character, with a magnificent war record—one of those magnetic personalities whose leadership is readily accepted.

In the heated condition of the public mind it was a great temptation to Conservatives, as a body, to follow the leadership of Judge Haskell. It was then that General EARLE showed the kind of metal of which he was made. He came out in a strong letter pleading for unity among the white men of South Carolina and advising his friends and supporters to vote for the nominee of the party, Capt. B. R. TILLMAN. In this General EARLE put under foot all selfish considerations, rose above natural inclinations, and acted from motives of highest and purest patriotism. I am sure a majority of the people of South Carolina concur in this statement, for at the first opportunity he was elected judge of the Eighth judicial circuit, largely by the votes and influence of those who had defeated him in 1890 for governor.

I remember a little incident illustrating some of Judge EARLE's characteristics. In 1892, when George T. Minor was seeking reelection, the first campaign meeting was held in the city of Greenville, where EARLE lived. Ex-Governor Sheppard was the nominee of the Conservatives. There was an immense crowd in the city, and partisan feeling ran high. After breakfast I was in Governor Tillman's room, when Judge EARLE walked in. Nothing could exceed the delicate courtesy with which he treated his former opponent. It was the first time that I had come into immediate contact with him, and I was much impressed with his chivalrous bearing. During the course of the conversation I remarked that I was surprised that the Conservatives had not renominated him. I will never forget the humorous smile and twinkle of the eye with which he replied, "Well, last campaign I never heard anything from 'early morn till dewy eve' but 'Hurrah for Tillman!' I am rather tired of the tune and perfectly willing for some one else to 'bell the cat.'"

In 1896 Judge EARLE entered the canvass for the United States Senate. Few expected him to be elected; but as the campaign progressed, charges, countercharges, and epithets were bandied back and forth between his two opponents, and there were enough people in South Carolina who wanted a high, pure man, against whose character naught could be said; and these, irrespective of faction, elected Judge EARLE to the Senate. Indeed, there had been so much extremism and bitterness on both sides that of necessity there was a backward swing of the pendulum and a move toward normal conditions. This resulted in the selection of a man who had, under all circumstances, preserved his own individuality and had been extreme upon neither side.

The interests of our people were identical, and they had become weary of so much strife and unnecessary contention. Judge EARLE had a true perception of this fact.

In his campaign he rose above small things, and discussed the issues from a statesmanlike standpoint; he appealed direct to the whole people irrespective of faction, and their generous response sent him to the Senate of the United States.

On January 26 the legislature confirmed the primary by unanimously electing him United States Senator for the term of six years. He was sworn in and took his seat, but within four short weeks from the opening of the extra session was taken sick, and upon the advice of his physician went to his home in South Carolina. He never returned. His career as student, lawyer, and statesman had forever closed. For a month a naturally strong constitution and iron will vainly battled against the fearful ravages of Bright's disease, but finally, on the 20th of May, 1897, he passed into the "Great Beyond." His death was marked by the calm fortitude which reveals the hope and courage of the Christian's faith. Fully conscious to the very last, he made his will, called his loved ones around him, took leave of the grief-stricken family, and went down into the dark valley as one sinks into peaceful slumber.

When a student of Furman University Senator EARLE accepted the Baptist creed as his standard of life, and honestly endeavored to carry his religion into his daily walk. His conversation was peculiarly chaste and pure, while his manner was calm, dignified, and courteous. There was something very striking in the personal appearance of Judge EARLE. Six feet tall, straight as an Indian, with a magnificent head and face finely poised upon a pair of broad shoulders, deep-set, penetrating eyes, and handsome features, he might have posed as a model for a sculptor's chisel.

His ideas of manhood were exalted, but he did not except himself, and at all times tried to live up to the ideal. Everybody knew JOSEPH H. EARLE as a brave, able, and honest man. Every position of responsibility to which he was called he filled with ability and distinction. Had he been spared, the high duties of Senator would have been discharged with credit to himself, honor to his State, and benefit to his country.

Estimated by comparison with his contemporaries and measured by the environments which he overcame, his career was one of unusual distinction. There was no spice of the demagogue in his composition, for I verily believe the corner stone of his life was grounded upon those bed rocks of character, courage and veracity, which, when coupled with intelligence, never fail to bring success and honor.

His popularity was not the ephemeral conquest of an aspiring politician over the emotions and prejudices of the people, but a steadfast and permanent hold upon their reason and judgment. He was a strong man intellectually, physically, and morally. Never weak and vacillating, "he knew himself and the ways before him." He was not a great orator in the popular acceptation of the term, but he was a pleasant speaker, with a deep, strong voice and a clear, clean-cut, incisive style which appealed to the reason and not the emotions of his audience.

Senator EARLE was most happy in his domestic relations and his devotion to home and family was a conspicuous trait in his character.

I went to the funeral last May in the beautiful mountain city where he lived. It was a touching sight—the newly made widow and fatherless children and a host of friends and relatives all with their heads bowed in grief at a loss which was irreparable. By every means in their power his friends and neighbors testified to the high esteem in which he was held, while prominent men from all over the State came to do honor to his memory. He leaves to his children the precious heritage of a name untarnished during an entire life by a single blot—a heritage more precious than "costly raiment and fine gold."

His life should be an incentive to every young man struggling against poverty, for it is a conspicuous example of what can be accomplished by persistent effort. He made the battle and won the victory over poverty and the trying conditions which fall to the lot of those early orphaned. All men in public life, from the beginning, have some object in view, some round of the ladder which they hope to attain. With his lofty ideals and high purposes, I have sometimes thought that perhaps within his innermost soul a seat in this, the most august deliberative body in the world, had been the one great ambition of his life. It certainly was no low or sordid ambition; one worthy of the noblest soul.

He won the prize and stood within the portals of success gazing with eager expectation into the future. What a mockery is human ambition! An ignis fatuus leading us madly onward until we grasp the coveted prize, only to find it naught save "dust and ashes." Before he could pluck the ripening fruits of his triumph, in the prime of manhood, in the midst of pleasant dreams, when life to him was so sweet, so full of that which human language fails to express, the grim harvester reached forth his hand and he is stricken down.

Truly, in the words of the poet:

> Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
> Like a fast-flitting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
> A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
> He passes from life to his rest in the grave.
> The leaves of the oak and the willow shall fade,
> Be scattered around, and together be laid;
> And the young and the old, and the low and the high
> Shall moulder to dust, and together shall lie.
> * * * * *
> 'Tis the wink of an eye, 'tis the draught of a breath
> From the blossom of health to the paleness of death,
> From the gilded saloon to the bier and the shroud!
> Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the circumstances connected with the death of our late associate, Senator JOSEPH H. EARLE, were peculiarly saddening and are strikingly suggestive of the brief and uncertain duration of the highest earthly honors. Doubtless no shorter period of Congressional service than his can be found in the annals of the Senate. His term began March 4, 1897, on which day he was sworn and took his seat, and he served during the executive session and beyond the opening of the extra session which began March 15; but about May 1 he disappeared from this floor and died at his home in Greenville, S. C., on Thursday, May 20.

After he had been sitting for one month, a keen and wondering observer of the unfamiliar scenes before him, he became justly impatient at the delay in reorganizing the committees of the Senate, so that the new members might do their share of the work of the session, which they could only effectively perform through participation in the investigations and deliberations of those indispensable subdivisions of every useful legislative body. Modestly and quietly, yet impressively, on April 6 he offered a resolution and asked for its immediate consideration, which declared that the Senate would on the next day proceed to reorganize its committees and to fill all vacancies therein. One Senator objected to the consideration on that day of the resolution and another Senator moved that it be referred to the Committee on Rules. When, however, Senator EARLE, as a new Senator, stated his desire to express himself as to the propriety of reorganizing the committees, unanimous consent was given, and he then spoke as follows:

Mr. EARLE. Mr. President, I have very few remarks to make. We have been in session over thirty days. Under the Constitution of the United States each State has a right to two Senators upon this floor, and the Senate has no right to deprive any State, either in part or in whole, of its full representation.

I wish to ask Senators who have been here for two and four years whether it is right that Senators who came into this body on the 4th of March shall be absolutely ignored so far as the committees are concerned? I do not wish—be it far from me—to violate what is known as the courtesy of the Senate. I would not offend against the most delicate sense of propriety; but, standing here as I do, a new Senator, representing in part the State of South Carolina, it seems to me that it is my duty to call the attention of this body to the fact that the State of South Carolina has two Senators and that only one of them has been assigned to committees.

We know that the most important work of legislation is performed by Senators upon committees. If you have the right to say that certain Senators shall not go upon committees for thirty days, then you would have an equal right to say they shall not go upon committees for six months, and you violate a principle. The Senate is a continuing body. It never dies. As one Senator goes out, another comes in. You may expel a Senator, but as soon as you do so the governor of the State, or the legislature, if in session, has a right to appoint or elect his successor. It is the theory of our Government that this body shall always continue, and I submit that when the Senate convenes upon the 4th of March at a time as early as is practicable thereafter the committees should be reorganized. Party exigency should not stand in the way. Party exigency should never be consulted in order to violate a principle.

That is all I have to say, Mr. President.

From these clear and cogent expressions of Senator EARLE's views as to the duty of the Senate to appoint its committees without delay no dissent was uttered, but the resolution under the objection made was passed over. Before it came up again, on April 8, Senator EARLE's sickness had come upon him and he was unable to be present. He honored me by sending to me a request that I would take charge of the resolution in his behalf, and he never again appeared upon this floor. He had spoken as a United States Senator for the first and the last time. Fatal disease had seized upon him, the inevitable summons to higher duties had come to him, and after a few weeks of anxious hope and grievous pain he passed on to his eternal home.

Not often has one of our number been taken by death away from such bright prospects of usefulness and happiness in a Senatorial career. Coming from a life spent in the practice of the profession of the law, he was admirably qualified for important and effective service as a legislator. The great change in his sphere of duty charmed and stimulated him and began to engage his highest capacity, to arouse his noblest faculties. Accompanied by his devoted wife and children, his new home in Washington was as gratifying to him as was his post of labor in the Senate. All the incidents of his changed life were pleasant and joyful; nothing was wanting to his cup of happiness, when it was taken from him. The wine of bitterness was pressed to his lips, which he could not refuse to drink, and he was sent out of the brightest sunshine into the dark shadow of death.

In my mind's eye I can see him now—that strong frame, that intellectual and refined face, those clear, kindly eyes, and that genial smile. Only yesterday we saw him for a moment, then the gates of heaven opened for him and he went forever from the sight of our mortal eyes. His stay with us was exceedingly short. But such, indeed, is the sum of all human existence, and even when we reflect upon the length of days of those we have in this life known the longest, their brevity is startling.

> Like shadows gliding o'er the plain,
> Or clouds that roll successive on,
> Man's busy generations pass
> And as we gaze their forms are gone.

In contemplating the record of our lost friend, we find nothing to censure, everything to commend. If to his family and friends there may be consolation in believing that his was a useful and honorable life, the facts abundantly warrant their faith. He was born in Greenville, S. C., April 30, 1847, and soon entered upon youthful struggles for a livelihood that would have overcome a less intrepid spirit. His father dying when he was 5 years old, the fortune he left was lost by the guardian of the boy, who was brought up by his aunt to a life of toil; he labored in the field at times, but sought and obtained a good education, walking from his home to and from Sumter Academy; and he early showed decision of character and vigor of body by saving a boy from drowning. He was only 14 when the war of secession began, and having had a thigh crushed by an accident he did not go early into the fight; but in July, 1864, he enlisted in Charles's Battery of Light Artillery, with which he served until the surrender of Johnston's army to Sherman in 1865, when he was a sergeant at 17 years of age.

After the war he pressed on with his studies, teaching school to earn money with which to pay his expenses at Furman University. In 1868 he became principal of an academy, and while teaching began studying law at night, and in April, 1870, was admitted to the bar. He lived at Anderson for five years, and in 1875 removed to Sumter. In the political revolution of 1876 he commanded one of the military companies then organized, and later became a captain in the Sumter Light Infantry and lieutenant-colonel on the staff of Governor Wade Hampton; and, whatever may have been the merits of this revolution, his zeal and efforts undoubtedly commended him strongly to the white people of his State, and caused his election in 1878 as a representative from Sumter County to the State legislature, in 1882 made him a State senator, in 1880 a delegate to the national convention which nominated Hancock and English, in 1884 a delegate to the first Cleveland convention, and in 1886 the attorney-general of the State.

Entering into later politics, he was an unsuccessful candidate for the nomination for governor against Mr. TILLMAN (the present senior Senator from South Carolina in this body); in 1892 returned to live at his native home, Greenville, and in 1894 was elected by the legislature as the judge of the Eighth judicial circuit, in which office he achieved a high reputation for industry, impartiality, and wisdom. His election to the United States Senate came after an exciting popular contest in public meetings against the candidacy of Governor Evans, in which Mr. EARLE triumphed by a majority of 3,318 votes, and was elected by the legislature on January 27, 1897, by a vote unanimous with one exception, entering upon his office on March 4 and dying on May 20, leaving a widow and three sons and five daughters.

Surely this brief review of a laborious life and a creditable private and public career must be suggestive and helpful to everyone who may read the tributes which the Senate is now paying to its honored dead.

Of more importance to us, however, than the gratification which this record of our recent associate affords is the faith which we cherish that the life to which he has now ascended is higher, better, and nobler than existence in this world of lights and shadows, of joys and griefs, of goodness abounding and of evil ever pursuing—a world too unintelligible that we despair of understanding it, and only look for its interpretation beyond this vale of tears, where he has gone and where we shall soon join him.

That there is a future life after this present state we do not allow ourselves to doubt. Senators who have been for the eleven years since March 4, 1897, members of this body will recall those of our number who have left these scenes for the world beyond.

The fourteen who died while members of the Senate were:
John S. Barbour, Virginia, May 14, 1892.
James B. Beck, Kentucky, May 3, 1890.
Alfred H. Colquitt, Georgia, March 26, 1894.
JOSEPH H. EARLE, South Carolina, May 20, 1897.
James Z. George, Mississippi, August 14, 1897.
Randall L. Gibson, Louisiana, December 15, 1892.
Isham G. Harris, Tennessee, July 8, 1897.
George Hearst, California, February 28, 1891.
John E. Kenna, West Virginia, January 11, 1893.
Preston B. Plumb, Kansas, December 20, 1891.
Leland Stanford, California, June 21, 1893.
Francis B. Stockbridge, Michigan, April 30, 1894.
Zebulon B. Vance, North Carolina, April 14, 1894.
Ephraim K. Wilson, Maryland, February 24, 1891.

The twelve who died after ceasing to be Senators were:
Joseph E. Brown, Georgia.
Richard Coke, Texas.
Nathan F. Dixon, Rhode Island.
Joseph N. Dolph, Oregon.
John R. McPherson, New Jersey.
Gilman Marston, New Hampshire.
Algernon S. Paddock, Nebraska.
Henry B. Payne, Ohio.
Bishop W. Perkins, Kansas.
Harrison H. Riddleberger, Virginia.
Daniel W. Voorhees, Indiana.
James F. Wilson, Iowa.

Tender memories of these our lost associates, on such an occasion as this, come readily to our thoughts. In imagination we can see them now before us, occupying their old familiar places. We can almost hear their voices, although they will not reply to our anxious questionings. Yet we continue to listen, hoping for a sure sign of their existence.

It singeth low in every heart,
We hear it each and all,
A song of those who answer not,
However we may call.

They throng the silence of the breast,
We see them as of yore,
The kind, the true, the brave, the sweet,
Who walk with us no more.

They have not been annihilated; we have not parted with them forever; we shall meet and see and verily hear them again in a world of activity, a world of achievement, a world of joy, and, God be praised, a world of sinlessness.

So we reverently deem the death of our late comrade and friend as really no loss, but as his real gain, as we are to have faith that our own departures will be our real gain—an advent into a new and glorious existence. We shall be fortunate if those who mourn for us can point to a life and death so full of hope and consolation as his. Let only the cheerful side be contemplated. He came among us gentle and refined, courteous and lovable. He soon passed away like a beautiful ray of the sunset, leaving suggestions of a brilliant sunrise on the morrow. On a bright afternoon in May, by direction of the Senate, we bore him tenderly to final repose at his South Carolina home. In his own house prayers were said. His neighbors and friends gathered about us, and we committed his mortal remains to the earth in the peaceful churchyard. We gave such condolence as we could to the widow and the orphans, and returned to our duties in this Chamber, blessed and made better by our contemplation of his worthy life and by our strengthened faith that the Creator, in His power and goodness, before the mountains were brought forth or ever He had formed the earth and the world, had decreed that immortal life should be the inheritance of all the children of men.

Ah, why should bitter tears be shed
In sorrow o'er the mounded sod,
When verily there are no dead
Of all the children of our God?

They who are lost to outward sense
Have but flung off their robes of clay.
And clothed in heavenly radiance
Attend us on our lonely way.

While sorrow's tears our eyes have wet,
Shed o'er the consecrated dust,
Too much our darkened souls forget
The lessons of enduring trust.

Let living faith serenely pour
Her sunlight on our pathway dim,
And death can have no terrors more,
But holy joy shall walk with him.

Senators, in our present daily life, whether amid the turmoil of the world's affairs or in the quiet of our own home, for reasons which all feel but few can explain, we converse but little of these great questions which are of supreme importance to every human soul. Yet as the years pass and youth and vigor yield to age and weakness, and our associates fall by our sides and we bear their remains to their last resting places and almost begin to count the days after which the places which now know us shall know us no more forever, there come times when our thoughts are irresistibly turned away from earth and fixed on higher things. Such moments are of priceless value to us, when, realizing the vanity of all human wishes and that we have here no continuing city, but only a brief abiding place, we also comprehend and rejoice at the illimitable destiny that is before us. How helpful it is that after such communings we can come back to the duties and labors of life, to its mingled fears and hopes, sorrows and joys, temptations and triumphs, failures and achievements, having in rapt imagination, like the seer of Patmos, caught inspiring glimpses of our final home, the New Jerusalem, the city of our God—

How gleam thy watch fires through the night
With never-fainting ray;
How rise thy towers, serene and bright,
To meet the dawning day.
In vain the surge's angry shock,
In vain the drifting sands;
Unharmed, upon the Eternal Rock,
The Eternal City stands.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, although Senator EARLE and myself represented adjoining States, I had never met him until we became members of this body. I had known of him as a public man for many years and watched with much interest his canvass, made under adverse circumstances, for the office of United States Senator. I knew he had served the people of his State with distinguished ability, and the people of my State rejoiced at his election. They thought they saw in his career one of marked ability and great usefulness, not only to South Carolina, but to the entire country. Doubtless had he lived, he would have met the most sanguine expectations of his friends.

I became attached to Senator EARLE soon after I met him, and during the short while he was in Washington scarcely a day passed we were not together. Our short acquaintance and public service ripened into a warm friendship. Socially he was a most delightful gentleman. His conversations were always elevating and pure, and his companionship was not only delightful, but also profitable. In his death I fully realize that his State and the nation have sustained a great and irreparable loss.

With the exception of the Senators of his own State, I was probably more intimate with him than any other member of this body. It is not my purpose, however, to go into the details or biography of his life. This doubtless should be left to his colleagues.

In his death I feel that I sustained a great personal loss. I miss him as friend, counselor, and companion. The highest eulogy I can pay him is to state that in private and public life I found him to be honest and faithful in the discharge of every duty. It seemed to be his highest purpose to advance every material interest of the people of his State. While he was broad and liberal in his views and devoted to the interests of the entire nation, his solicitude for the welfare of the people of his own State and his deep anxiety in all that concerned them and his readiness to make every sacrifice necessary to advance their interest was clearly manifested in his entire life; but in the prime of his usefulness he was summoned from earthly scenes to his final home.

Senator EARLE'S election to the Senate was the beginning of his career as a national legislator. He took the oath of office and entered upon the discharge of his duties as Senator on the 4th of March, 1897, and died on the 20th of May following. Consequently his services as Senator were of short duration. While he had never before been a member of either branch of Congress, he had served his own State in both branches of the legislature and as attorney-general and judge with distinguished ability and to the entire satisfaction of his own people.

He held the office of attorney-general for two terms, and in this capacity was the legal adviser of his State for four consecutive years, and I am informed that during his entire administration he lost not a single case in the courts. He ranked among the ablest lawyers of his State.

As judge he had an absolute and undeviating purpose to administer the law independently of personal considerations.

As an advocate he accomplished his purposes by no maneuvering or indirect methods, but went boldly and fearlessly up to his work, strong in his convictions of right and absolutely fearless of the consequences to himself. His inflexible honesty and devotion to duty marked every step in his private and public life.

What higher eulogy could be paid any man? A knowledge of his ability as a lawyer and his exalted character as a public man had preceded him to the Senate. He was recognized when he entered this body as a man well equipped to discharge the arduous duties connected with the highest office within the gift of the people of his State. He died within less than three months after he became a member of the Senate. He only attended the session of the Senate for six weeks, when he was stricken with an acute attack of Bright's disease, from which he never recovered. During this time he only addressed the Senate once, and then very briefly. He had a clear, ringing voice that easily penetrated every part of this Chamber and made a splendid impression upon his hearers. He was cut down in his forty-ninth year, in the vigor and strength of his manhood and in the beginning of his career as national legislator.

Had his life been spared, what a brilliant career he had before him. He had a term of six years in the Senate to test the full measure of his capabilities; and had he been permitted to gather what he had sown, doubtless his career as Senator would have been crowned with great usefulness and honor. But he was plucked from among us in the noonday of life, possessing the esteem and unbounded confidence of the people of his State.

Why a man with such possibilities and in the very prime of his usefulness should be called from life into death passes my comprehension. But we should accept without a murmur the decrees of a just, wise, and merciful God.

Mr. President, before I close my remarks I wish to say a few words relative to his domestic life. When he came to take his seat as a member of this Chamber, he was accompanied by his wife, eldest son, and two little daughters. I was often with them, and I have never known a man more devoted to his family. To make them happy was the supreme purpose of his life. He often said to me that his quiet home among the forest trees of Greenville was the abode of his real happiness. That home, once so happy and joyous, is now darkened with sadness and sorrow. Death, the heritage of all, has been a visitor there. This Senate to-day sends a message of love and sympathy to the widowed wife and orphan children of the distinguished dead.

The happy home that was once hallowed by the presence of a loyal husband and affectionate father is sad and desolate, but, thank God, that home is not without hope. He had long been a consistent member of the Baptist Church, and his eloquent pastor spoke beautifully of his Christian life when his remains were laid to rest. He said:

> We stand under the overshadowing mystery of death, a mystery which no human philosophy has been able to relieve of its gloom. In this instance its darkness has been intensified by the peculiar circumstances in which the stroke has fallen. A noble and beautiful life has been cut short in the hour of its supreme usefulness. We thank God there rests upon it no stain of dishonor. In it truth has not been sacrificed and courage has not faltered.
> Death has put a period to a career in the private and public vicissitudes of which there has been consistently maintained a bearing which suggests in the fullness of the original meaning that fine old designation, gentleman. He feared God and not any man. He loved righteousness and scorned everything mean. He trusted the Lord Jesus Christ and was considerate of his fellow-man. He gave his distinguished abilities in faithful service to his country. He had a high and worthy ambition, and rose by patient, persevering effort from the common walks of life to the highest honor in the gift of the people of his State, and died in the fullness of his powers.

This splendid eulogy was paid him by his pastor, who knew him, honored him, and loved him.

Mr. President, I was one of the committee to attend his remains to their last resting place in his beloved State. It was there I witnessed the admiration and love cherished for him by his own people.

To fully appreciate a man's real character, to estimate his genuine worth, to pass correct judgment upon his life, we must learn how he is regarded and esteemed by his neighbors. The funeral services were held in the church where Senator EARLE had worshiped for years. The city of Greenville was in mourning, business was suspended, and sadness and sorrow could be seen in every face. The people knew they had lost a leader, counselor, and a friend, an honest, fearless, and faithful public servant.

A great concourse of all classes was present to do honor to his memory. The history of his life fully illustrates what honesty, industry, and devotion to duty will accomplish.

His splendid and successful career has ended, and all must realize the loss to the nation. As long as history treasures up faithful public service, as long as a pure and stainless life is honored and revered, so long will his life and services be remembered by his people as an example worthy of the highest emulation. The story of his life will illumine the brightest pages of the history of his State. This story is not only an invaluable heritage to his widow and his children, but one which should be a lesson and inspiration to the struggling youth of our country.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I met Mr. EARLE for the first time on the day he became a member of the Senate, but a few weeks, alas, before he went from this Chamber "to the lone couch of his everlasting sleep," and the words I shall utter of him must be brief, although they are not in any wise perfunctory.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN] has paid an eloquent and appreciative tribute to his memory. The senior Senator from South Carolina will speak of him from the standpoint of a political competitor, an excellent vantage ground for accurate estimate of the characteristics and traits of another. He will, I know, speak eloquently, earnestly, and sincerely. In the heat of conflict we learn to know the quality and fiber of an opponent.

This is especially true in the field of political warfare, where personal ambitions clash, and the foe in that arena who is always manly, direct, and sincere, giving hard blows and taking them in return, never striking "below the belt," never forgetting what chivalry demands of the "true knight," well earns respect, admiration, and confidence. That Senator EARLE was such a man will be warmly testified by the senior Senator from South Carolina, and is, moreover, conclusively established by the circumstances under which he won the confidence of his people.

Senator EARLE was a man of attractive personality. His was a clear-cut, intellectual face, and his bearing was of exceeding dignity. He was graceful, and of winning address. I sought him more than once during his short stay among us for conversation, and found him an engaging and charming gentleman.

Once only he addressed the Senate. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has just quoted his language on that occasion. Senator EARLE was speaking when I entered the Chamber, and immediately arrested my attention. His words were few, but well chosen. He spoke without apparent embarrassment, although with great earnestness. His voice was ringing, but sweet and well modulated, and every word was spoken with peculiar distinctness.

In a dignified, strong, eloquent, and withal modest manner he asserted the right of each State to be represented by two Senators, each assigned to committees, and each thereby fully permitted to participate in the important work of preparing legislation. He regarded the Senate without fully organized committees as out of harmony with the Constitution. His argument was conclusive. He commanded the attention of the Senate, made an impression upon the body, and evoked from more than one in my hearing the opinion that South Carolina had chosen wisely when she sent him to the Senate.

I can well believe, Mr. President, that he was a powerful man in the court room, whether in the argument of a proposition of law or in appeal to a jury.

From his conversation he seemed to have reached the summit of his ambition, although he chiefly valued a seat in this body for the opportunity it afforded to a thoughtful, earnest, able man to render public service. This view, which he once expressed to me, went far to establish his fitness for the honor.

Although, in the providence of God, he was with us but a few weeks, the highest tribute to his quality and character is to be found in the universal feeling of Senators that by his untimely death the Senate suffered a distinct loss. It is not at all to be doubted that had he been spared, he would have rendered to South Carolina rich return for the confidence which she had reposed in him and to the country at large conspicuous service in this great forum.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I always take a special interest in those things which relate to South Carolina. My maternal grandfather and grandmother long lived in that State, and I have a great uncle, now surviving at an extreme age near my home in Texas, who voted in South Carolina for Andrew Jackson when he first ran for President in 1824. He remembers with keen personal interest the statesmen of our earlier days, and now, although his life almost spans a century, he still takes an interest in South Carolina politics and never fails to call on me for an account of the public men who represent her in the Federal Congress.

So when Senator EARLE came into this body at the extraordinary session which convened in March, 1897, I greeted him with a warmth perhaps somewhat greater than the welcome which is usually given to a new Senator. I was glad to find that he would sit near me, and soon spoke to him of the ties which bound me to his State. He seemed to me to be an exact type of the South Carolinian, at home or abroad. He was such a man as represented that great State forty, sixty, or eighty years ago, and I think four words might describe him almost as accurately as a volume.

I would say that he was quick, acute, open, and aggressive.

Ten minutes' conversation with him was sure to bring to notice all these qualities, and I think I can hardly be mistaken in supposing that they are the characteristics which made him powerful and popular at home, and they could not have failed to earn for him a high place in the Federal Congress.

So close were our seats in the Senate that we often conversed about pending matters with the freedom which I believe marks the intercourse of deskmates in every grade of duty, from the schoolroom to the Senate or the synod. In this way I came to know him perhaps as well as anyone in this body who made his acquaintance after his appearance here.

His comment upon men and affairs exhibited reflection and precision. When he talked or when he listened, his eyes sparkled with animation, and there was every indication of reserve force and latent fire. Every movement of the man showed candor and openness. His regular attendance upon the sessions of the Senate testifies to his diligence.

In the only speech which he had the opportunity to make in this body he exhibited, as Senators must have noticed from its reading, a high conception of the courtesies of the Senate, and his own rights and those of his State, and the proper methods of legislation. Above all, he exhibited, even in this casual appearance in debate, that spirit of enterprise and love of action which I have heretofore described as aggressiveness.

I shall not undertake to deal with his personal history. His old friends in this Chamber will sufficiently touch those parts of the man's photograph. I only present the mere glimpses derived from a short acquaintance.

A few days ago we spoke of Senator Harris, of Tennessee, a man whose life for twenty years prior to his death was a sort of record of the Senate's work. Here we speak of one who died before he was barely known to his Senatorial associates. Thus cut off from the opportunities for which he had hoped and fought, the curtain is rung down upon a career which might have widened till it thrilled the world.

At last it may be described, in all its brevity, as a great career, for though in the providence of God he has been denied the opportunity to hew out a history here or even to serve a single term in this body, it must ever be a pride to his family and a tribute to his memory that he was deemed by the people of South Carolina worthy to be placed upon the roll of her United States Senators, that roll upon which are perpetuated the names of Pinckney, and Sumter, and Huger, and Elmore, and Barnwell, and Gaillard, and Preston, and Hammond, as well as the blazing titles of Robert Y. Hayne, George McDuffie, and John C. Calhoun.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, JOSEPH H. EARLE, the soldier, the Senator, has answered the last roll call of this world. If the bravery of his career on earth is any assurance of the composure with which he will confront the judgment seat, we may well believe that he will stand there serene in the strength which knows no faltering, willing to receive the appointed decree for all the thoughts and all the words and all the deeds which marked his little day on earth. It is a splendid hope that the grandest quality of the human soul—steadfastness—can not be lost in the transition from this life of death to the deathless life.

Greater than the affection which prompts us to devote this hour to an expression of eulogy for the citizen departed, for the friend gone to the other Mansion, for the battle-nerved arm quieted in the coffin, for the honest voice stilled in the soft nighttime of the grave, is the duty upon us to pause in this solemn instant in our country's career and contemplate the brevity of mundane experience and the speeding toward us all of that sunset hour when earthly hope and earthly life are enveloped in the shadows. The sense of death hallows the judgment of men and sanctifies the purpose of nations.

Let us in this view of our larger duty devote to this memorial service the time which belongs to the country. JOSEPH H. EARLE and his fellow-Senators met in this official sphere as birds meet at sea, giving but the signal of a fluttered wing as they drive along through swirling tempests, and scarcely pausing to turn an eye to watch each other's flight beyond opposed horizons. I knew this departed one but briefly; and yet admiringly, for he was a soldier-gentleman, so considerate of all the high requirements of social and official intercourse that every contact with him seemed but to more endear him to his fellows. I knew him best as the reconciled representative of a reconciled people—as one who felt that the Cause for which he had offered his life was won when it was lost.

No words from human lips can add to the dignity of that epitaph which his own career has written: JOSEPH H. EARLE, the orphaned lad, offering his heart's best blood to the State he loved; JOSEPH H. EARLE, the United States Senator, offering his soul's best thought to the people of the country which he loved more. That which we can say must be for the comfort of remaining humanity and not to bless him. It is an instructive thought that not all the words which earthly pens can trace, nor all the sentiments which human lips can utter, can add one jot to or take one tittle from the character which was the formation of his 50 years as we count earthly time.

He was a man. And in this one man was folded all the universe, with its dark abysms of eternal silence, its immeasurable spaces filled with the mysteries of unknowing and unknown; and with all its lighted worlds of heavenly harmony, its precessional march of infinite power, and its sublimer mystery of some time knowing all as we are known.

As the breathing flower, as the wind-stirred leaf, as the upspringing grass blade contains within its tiny self the problem of progression and its solving, and as it has its individual and impregnable identity amidst all its fellows; so man, every man, bears within himself, in the illumination of his soul, the possibility of all knowledge, all virtue, all law by which the universe is and is governed, all processes by which the worlds are framed, and, in its darker chambers, all the possibilities of woe and destruction and infinite gloom—and he has his own individuality, in which, through all the eternity, there can not come the unholy intrusion of any other essence.

This order is not complex; it is of all things most plain—that man of his Creator born, the chief of all things created, is of the creative power an eternal part. From him, in earthly life, spring the majesty of nations and the downfall of dynasties. If we could know of that hidden thing, the first man, and could lay bare to finite knowledge the wonder of his possibilities, we would see that in him was the germ of all that was to be—the song of love and the shriek of hate; the whisper of peace and the trump of war; the crucifixion and the crucified; the home of hope where innocence with instinct supernatural calls all things good because they are, and because they are of God, and the slaughter pen of infamy, where innocence perishes, doubting of mercy because it seems to be withheld, and doubting of mercy's God because He does not seem to speak; the palace and the hovel; the plenty and content which flow from wisdom, and the want and degradation which come of laws denied; the liberty-crowned domes beneath which freemen speak for freemen, and the dungeons of the secret tyranny; the fight of savage men to overcome a savage earth; the triumph of that intellect which, in the evolution of this life, has grown too large for the limitations of our poor measure of time and space; the unions and the revolutions; the wandering stars, gathered into one field of blue and made the flag of a consecrated people, inspired with a holy purpose to redeem the world for its exaltation as a heavenly home. All good, all evil, are his. It is the whisper of his own immortality that asks him on to deathless deeds; it is the clog of his own earthliness that holds him in the mire of things that die in their doing. As immortality step by step conquers the earthliness, the man of the now is rising into realms of greater light, and upon him is dawning the day of reflected infinite knowledge that peace and order are the law of that universe of which he holds the essence. To this end he is marching, led on by inspiration, led on by that eternal impulsion which makes the generations go from good things unto better; until—surmounting all—from him, in eternal life, springs the majesty of worlds, peopled and glorious. In every evolution which has marked his passage he can see, if he will, the unassailable certainty of that eternal time for him. Earthly evolution is but the type of spiritual evolution. It is the monition of a lesson which we sometimes try to forget, but which comes to us in the silent watches of the night, in the hour of loneliness at sea, by the bedside of friends departing, and, more sacredly and certainly than all, in the hope to meet again the friends already gone.

This life, as a part of the eternity to which it belongs, is not even as a speck of cosmic dust to the infinite space to which it reddens under the crimson sun. There is a future, as there was a past. As the past is lost to our remembrance lest we lose our energy by retrospection, so the future is mercifully hidden from us lest we rush from life with heedless haste or feel a saddened discontent with earth. But that it is, and that it is forever, as it was forever, all the best moments of man bear witness.

No human soul is satisfied with the hopeless horror of oblivion. To have emerged from nothingness, to have gasped this earthly air for the fretting instant of a fretted human life, and then to have plunged into nothingness is to have been of a humanity damned from birth to death with causeless, useless struggle in a wretched world of nothingness. The grave is not extinction; it is the door of home; it is God's portal through which we pass from this little light of life to the greater light of a better life. Just so surely as we live to die, just so surely do we only die to live.

Doubt of eternal life would be a self-inflicted cruelty, if there were room for doubt. But this is true: It is either oblivion before we were, nothingness now, and oblivion after we are, or it is life forever. Of these two, every man from whom a dearer than himself has passed away will, in the holiest chamber of his thought, beneath the stony front which he presents to all the world, hold fast the hope which is knowledge, that it is life forever.

Earthly science has its vast domain, in which it triumphs and subdues; but beyond the measure of its widening achievements, and beyond the bounded realm of certainty, abides the unbounded realm of holy faith. Passing all comfort that mortality can give—balm to the wounded heart, sustenance to the poverty stricken, justice to the oppressed, benediction to the orphaned and the widowed and all who mourn, is the prophetic vision which stands for us through the ages:

> Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, in paying tribute to the memory of JOSEPH H. EARLE, late a Senator from South Carolina, I do so with the most profound sincerity. Judge EARLE having always lived in the State in which he was born and which he represented in this body, his whole life was interwoven with the history of South Carolina and its interests, and the happiness and welfare of its people were always his concern.

Faithful in his loyalty and devotion to his native State, while yet a boy he entered the service of the Confederacy in the war between the States, enlisting in Charles's Battery of Light Artillery, Johnston's army, in which he served to the end of the war. After the close of the war and when the two great armies which for four years had maintained a struggle such as the world had not before seen returned to the pursuits of peace, he at once resumed his studies, graduating from Furman University at Greenville, S. C., in 1867. After reading law he was called to the bar of his State in 1870 and practiced his profession until the time of his death.

While my acquaintance with Judge EARLE was limited and of short duration, covering only the period during which he was a member of this body—less than three months—I had formed for him in that short time a most warm attachment and high regard. A gentleman of the highest standard, courteous and considerate, he was of those men whose friendship is so much to be desired.

South Carolina has given many evidences of the high esteem in which Judge EARLE was held by those who knew him best. That he was twice chosen a member of the general assembly, attorney-general for two terms, and a judge of the circuit court of that State are some of the evidences of that esteem.

Grounded in the belief that as the chosen representative of the people he became their servant, and in consequence was bound to give an account of his stewardship to those whose servant he was, his official acts were ever performed in the strictest obedience to a conscientious regard of the law and right and to the best interests of the people. And only such a faithful and honest discharge of his many official duties and responsibilities could have won for him the promotions he received at the hands of the people of his State, ending in his election to membership in this body.

Coming into the Senate in the prime of manhood—ripe in that experience which comes of close and intimate contact with the people, and strong from years of active work in that profession which so well fits men for the responsibilities upon which he was entering—a future of great usefulness seemed open to him, and had his life been spared, he would have brought to the Congress of the United States, as a Senator from South Carolina, that same sterling worth, ability, and integrity which in such a marked degree distinguished his career as a lawyer and jurist of his own State.

He was most interested in the condition of the great producing classes of his State and country, and, in a conversation had with me soon after he came to the Senate, he said that no question interested him so much as the conditions of the farming classes of the country, and that he looked forward with great anxiety to the time when these conditions would be changed and those classes again prosperous. He hoped to witness this change, hoped to aid in bringing it about, but—

> Oft our hopes are doomed to die in sorrow,
> Oft our seedtime knows no harvest-morrow—

and Senator EARLE passed from earth into that Great Unknown without the fruition of that desire, which was the betterment of the conditions of millions of his fellow-men.

Death is seldom welcome, but never so unwelcome as when it cuts down the young, the strong, and the useful; when it takes those upon whom depend the helpless; and so it was in the death of Senator EARLE. Less than 50 years of age, he was among the young men of the Senate, and only a little time before his death, when he came into the Senate, there was every evidence of that physical strength which, with his age, would seem to prophesy for him many more years of usefulness, many years more to be given to those who were dependent upon him—a devoted wife and loving children, who were ever his constant solicitude.

Possessed of high and honorable hopes for the future of his children, he hesitated at no sacrifice which could be for their substantial welfare and true happiness.

While he was a stranger to most of us in this Chamber, he has, nevertheless, left upon the minds of us all a most lasting impression—that impression which always comes from contact with greatness, not alone of mind, but of soul; and none in this Chamber can ever forget JOSEPH H. EARLE. The memory of him will be ours until we, like him, fall before the sickle of the destroyer, when, through the loving mercy of Divine Providence, we hope for that state of eternal rest to which, through the blessings of that Providence, he has already succeeded.

Mr. MCENERY. Mr. President, the members of the Senate will remember the appearance of the late Senator JOSEPH H. EARLE on the floor of this Chamber. Tall, erect, with face and figure denoting strong and vigorous health, mental power, and intellectual supremacy.

The announcement of his serious illness so soon after he commenced his duties was a surprise, and his untimely death a shock to the people who honored and trusted him and to his associates here who expected much from him, as he came here with a reputation for intellectual vigor and moral worth, and with a mind well furnished in all that relates to the high duties which he was called on to perform.

His early life brought him into contact with the rough experience of war, a school that is harsh and forbidding in many of its details, but nevertheless calculated to stimulate the mental faculties and to impress upon the moral faculties the nobility of courage, magnanimity in victory, and fortitude in adversity.

He was well trained to pursue his studies after the struggles of war had subsided, and better qualified to enter upon the most sacred duty ever intrusted to man—the education of the youth of his native State.

The evidence from every locality and in every place where he pursued this high calling is that he was a successful teacher, not only in imparting useful and valuable knowledge, but the impress of his character was there as a standard for moral worth.

At the bar he was a courteous lawyer, fully imbued with the nobility of the profession, and he never lowered it to the standard of making of his professional ability an article of trade and barter. He was a successful lawyer. His ability caused his selection for the office of attorney-general of South Carolina, which office, we have been told by the people of that State, speaking through the public press, he filled with unusual ability, at once placing his name alongside of the famed lawyers which South Carolina has given to the nation.

His promotion was rapid. No man can thus advance so rapidly in public esteem and the affections of the people without having rare qualities of mind and heart. From the office of the attorney-general he was placed on the bench.

We are told by those who were acquainted with his judicial life that he was a jurist of rare attainments, accurate judgment, painstaking and studious, and possessing that essential faculty which makes an upright judge, a judicial conscience, which works always to find out the right, to do that for which courts are established, justice between litigants. We are told that no local or partisan considerations, no prejudices of any kind, warped his judgment, but that with an even temper and an impartial mind he read the record to find where justice and equity prevailed.

There was mourning and grief in all South Carolina when his death was announced. The press announced that a great affliction had fallen upon the State.

The columns of the papers gave evidence of the estimation in which he was held by his people.

At the bar, in political office, on the bench, and among his people, he was described as an upright man, an able, honest public official; in private life, as a man without a blemish; and at his home, the devoted husband and father. One of his intimate friends told me that from his earliest youth to the last of his days nothing ever escaped his lips that could not with propriety have been said in the bosom of his family.

His rare attainments of mental and moral worth were the growth of centuries. He inherited these qualities. His family history reveals the sources of his greatness. From a remote period, in England and in America, some member of it in each generation has held high place in the professions and under government, and in every instance it is recorded that they were men of honor, of courage, and of ability.

My acquaintance with Senator EARLE was of brief duration. It commenced with the extra session; but the few weeks I enjoyed his acquaintance ripened into a firm friendship, and I knew him as a man of the noblest qualities of head and heart and one whose friendship it was a great privilege to enjoy. In all the public positions he had held he made for himself an enduring reputation.

Logically he would have acquitted himself with distinction in the councils of the nation. Just as he entered upon the threshold of a life of prominent usefulness the dark curtain was drawn; but we can well and truthfully imagine the scenes of activity hidden from our view in which he would have been a great actor, impressing upon every event the high qualities of mind and character which were so eminently developed in him.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in rising to address the Senate on this sad occasion I shall depart from the form of eulogy which is customary. I can not speak of Senator EARLE from the standpoint of personal friendship; I can not from extended personal observation and experience pay tribute to his character and virtues as a man and as a private citizen. I can not speak of him even from the standpoint of political friendship. While we both entered this Senate as representatives of the Democracy of South Carolina and he had publicly announced his purpose to cooperate with me in the Senate if elected, we were not friends in the common acceptation of the term, nor were we political allies. What I shall say, therefore, in honor of my dead colleague will be more worthy of acceptation and carry more weight by reason of the antagonism that existed between us as rival candidates for the governorship in 1890, and later on because I felt it my duty to lend all the help I could to the gentleman who opposed him in his race for the Senate.

Senator EARLE and myself were never brought into close contact except during an exciting political canvass, and I therefore had no opportunity to judge the man as he bore himself toward his friends and neighbors. But during that canvass I watched him, and had opportunities such as no other man in South Carolina or out of it ever had to get an insight to his character and a correct appreciation of his sterling worth and brave, unflinching manhood during a most trying ordeal. It may not be of interest to the Senate, and I have almost doubted the propriety of entering on this occasion into a recital of events in which I myself bore so conspicuous a part. It is not egotism or any desire to inject my own personality into the discussion of Senator EARLE'S services and merits. But if I fail by reason of such consideration to discuss the subject from that standpoint, I will fail to discharge my duty as I see it, and no one else can perform that duty as well as I can. Indeed, no one can or will perform it at all. If I do not do it, the fame and record of the virtues of the dead Senator would lack that testimonial which I alone can give here and which, given under the circumstances, can but help to link his name by stronger bonds to South Carolina's history.

Senator EARLE sat in this body a very short time. The illness which resulted in his death seized him within thirty days after he took the oath of office, and he disappeared from our midst to return no more. His star had climbed the heavens until it had reached the zenith and there shone with a calm and steady brilliancy. Suddenly, like a meteor, it sank beneath the horizon and went out in darkness, leaving naught as a reminder that it ever held a place in the Senatorial galaxy save the memory of one short speech of two minutes. That speech made its impress on the minds of his hearers and stamped the new Senator as a good constitutional lawyer and a man who would not tamely submit to injustice or yield one jot or tittle of the rights of his State and of his people.

But, as impressive as was his utterance and eloquent as was his plea, it only gave promise of a career that closed all too suddenly and sadly. Senator EARLE will not be remembered for what he did here. His record is not a Senatorial one. His reputation must rest upon his actions and utterances while he was an officer of South Carolina and before he was sent here as her representative. Realizing this in the fullest degree, and anxious as I am to give that part of his life the greatest prominence which will tend to perpetuate his memory, I must follow the course I have marked out, even though it deals with occurrences in which I myself acted an important part.

A brief recital of historical events in my State will be necessary for a clear understanding of the causes which led up to the most exciting and intensely bitter campaign that has ever convulsed any State in this Union. There are people in South Carolina, where most of Senator EARLE'S friends live, and where his good name and the honor due him will be most cherished, who will not thank me for this exposition, and who will severely censure me for making it, but, as I have said once before, I am not seeking the plaudits of anyone or trying to do anything except to discharge a solemn duty to the dead man whose one striking characteristic was devotion to duty. It is a simple act of justice to him without caring for its effect on me. I know if he were alive, he would do as much for me. Indeed, he did, in 1892, by writing a letter for publication, do such an act of justice for me which made him very unpopular at the time.

The real friends of the dead Senator will see the justice of this view of the matter and will thank me for giving prominence to that part of his career which is the lasting basis of his fame. It is not as a Senator that he will be remembered, nor is his record as judge and attorney-general, honorable and worthy though it be, his highest claim to remembrance. His candidacy for governor in 1890 and the fact that he so bore himself in that campaign, in which he carried only 4 counties in 35, that six years later he won the Senatorship by a popular vote given largely by the very men who howled him down in 1890—this is the man's claim to immortality, and I shall tell the story as briefly as I can and as I understand its phases and facts, concealing nothing and anxious only to state the truth as I understand it. I do this knowing that there are men who will be ready to dispute the facts and also deny the conclusions. That is a right I shall not attempt to deny to any man. Those who hear and read what I say must determine for themselves the truthfulness and impartiality of the story.

Up to the period of reconstruction South Carolina never had a real popular government. It was so in form only. The State was settled first along the coast, as were the other colonies, and up to and succeeding the Revolutionary war a preponderance of its people resided in the tier of counties bordering on the ocean. These people were largely the descendants of the Huguenots, who fled from religious persecution in France, and of the English, who had been sent over by the lords proprietors. The Piedmont, or upper portion of the State, had been settled during the first half of the eighteenth century by a large influx of Scotch-Irish, German, and Dutch settlers from Pennsylvania. There were also settlements of persons in different counties of Scotch Highlanders, Irish, and English. These interior settlers owned few slaves, while the planters of the coast counties owned a great many. They differed from these latter in many ways.

Under the State constitution adopted in 1790 the apportionment of political power in the State senate was such as to fix and perpetuate the domination of the coast counties by reason of the fact that each parish of those counties, which were organized after the manner of the Church of England, was given a senator, while the interior counties, then large in area and sparsely settled, were given only one Senator each. The county of Charleston, with its nine parishes, was thus given nine senators, and the other coast counties had proportionate numbers of senators not at all corresponding with their population later on.

This one-sided and unfair condition was a source of constant angry discussion and led to a division of "up country" and "low country" in State politics and insured the absolute domination of the city of Charleston in State affairs. All efforts to undo the wrong were futile. The same constitution provided that the governor and other State officers and the judges of the supreme and circuit courts should be elected by the legislature, so that the people were permitted to vote only for members of Congress, county officers, and members of the legislature. And the control of the machinery of the counties even for the disbursing of taxes and performing other duties incident to county government were in charge of a board of commissioners appointed at the capital. This government was as nearly aristocratic as has existed anywhere in America, and two generations had passed away, and a third, habituated to its requirements, was in possession of the government when the civil war came on.

The large slave owners and families of greatest prominence and wealth, by intermarriage and other alliances, held absolute sway in State politics, and the masses were mere puppets to register their will. The State was Democratic or independent in national politics, but it was aristocratic in local affairs. This aristocracy, be it said to its credit, gave the State as good government, so far as purity and honesty were concerned, as any country ever had. But a prouder, more arrogant, or hot-headed ruling class never existed. Under the reconstruction constitution of 1868 the election of governor and State officers was given to the people by direct vote, and the scheme of county government was decentralized and placed in charge of a board of county commissioners elected by the people. Each county was given one Senator, while Charleston was allowed to have two.

During the eight years of radical misrule, when the carpetbaggers and their negro dupes trampled the whites under foot in a way no other English-speaking community ever endured "since the Saxon wore the Norman's collar," there was no opportunity for growth along the lines of true American citizenship and genuine Democracy. To define it more clearly, there was no such thing as the rule of the people, either white or black. When, in 1876, the white people, in desperation, rose and overthrew the reconstruction government and drove out the vampire horde of thieves and bribe takers, they were confronted with this condition: There was a clear numerical majority of negroes of voting age of about 30,000, and it is a self-evident proposition that "white unity" was the battle cry that most appealed to the sense and patriotism of every white man in the State.

Aside from the condition of semi-anarchy and the burdensome taxation which had existed, the reconstruction government had dissipated the assets of the State bank amounting to $3,000,000, had squandered the State's interest in railroads to an equal amount, and had issued bonds increasing the State debt from $6,000,000 to more than $20,000,000, with nothing to show for it. It is small wonder, then, that the whites knew and understood the needs of unity.

The political demarcation was a color line, pure and simple. Democracy meant white supremacy; Republicanism meant the rule of the African and carpetbagger, and native scalawag, the most despised of the three. The newly emancipated white men, who stood erect in the consciousness of being once more citizens of South Carolina, and freemen as far as the State was concerned, followed the leaders who had led in the fight for that emancipation with almost blind idolatry. These leaders at once became almost omnipotent in State politics; and the paramount thought in the minds of everyone was how to retain control of the State government.

Prior to the war there had been little or no division along party lines in the State. It was said that "when Calhoun took snuff, the State sneezed;" and hero worship has always been a leading characteristic of our people. The lack of familiarity with partisan or party politics and the total lack of familiarity with the machinery for controlling and directing party policies were great drawbacks. In fact, the people knew almost nothing about such things. The four years of war and the eight years of reconstruction, during which there was paralysis of citizenship, had bred a torpor which made it easy for the old aristocratic families and those in alliance with them to resume control, and the necessities of the political situation, the enforced white unity, made it easy to continue that control.

The constitution had been changed, the power vested in the people, but the conditions were not favorable for its exercise. Party nominations were made in convention (I mean as to State officers and Congressmen, and in many counties for all officers) from 1876 to 1890. From 1876 to 1880 there were no causes of complaint—every white man was satisfied with the management of affairs and everyone set about actively rebuilding the State and advancing his individual interests. But in 1880 the poison began to work. Ring rule is an inevitable growth where only one party exists. The conventions were manipulated as they usually are by court-house rings, and these worked under the direction of a statehouse ring.

While there were mutterings of discontent, which constantly grew in intensity with the management of local or State affairs and with the way in which the people were ignored in parceling out the offices, the thought of "independentism"—division among the whites—was abhorrent to every good Carolinian. The nomination by the party conventions was equivalent to election, and he was regarded as a public enemy who dared to raise his voice in criticism or objection. One or two spasmodic efforts to overthrow ring rule were made in the mountain counties, where there was a majority of white voters and where the people had not suffered so much as in the negro counties, but the leaders denounced all such efforts as unpatriotic and declared that "an independent was worse than a radical;" and, with the memory of their oppressions rankling in their minds, the people reechoed the sentiment and acted upon it. Thus were the conditions produced and the mine laid for the explosion which came in 1890.

The antebellum conditions were entirely changed. The large fortunes of the old slave owners had been destroyed by the results of the war and with them had been destroyed, in a large measure, class distinctions. The Confederate soldiers while fighting had also been going to school. There was a quickened intelligence and a more thorough understanding of the correct principles of government, and the demand for popular government and equality of privilege made rapid growth. It was seen that a certain coterie of politicians were running things in the interest of themselves, their kindred, and friends, and the people had grown very tired of the inevitable answer to any of their complaints, "Hush, or you will split the Democratic party."

The agitation which led to the revolution or explosion had begun in 1886, and it had taken four years of discussion and of agitation, after six years of dissatisfaction ever on the increase, to prepare the minds of the people and to organize them to overthrow the oligarchy which had fallen heir to the power of the old antebellum aristocracy. The State was ruled during these ten years absolutely by the two cities of Columbia and Charleston; and as they did this through their allies living in the other towns of the State, the agitation for reform had assumed the complexion of an agricultural movement, in which the farmers or country people were embattled against the cities and towns. It was not an agrarian movement in any sense of the term, and it antedated the Alliance movement by two years. A large majority of the white people live in the country, and many of these farmers—thousands of them—are as intelligent and well educated men as there are in the State, and they own a large share of its wealth.

Senator EARLE had entered politics shortly after the overthrow of the carpetbag régime first as representative, then as senator from Sumter County, and while he belonged to one of the best families of the State—one noted for its prominent men and wealth—he himself, as a result of war, had had to struggle in his young manhood with poverty, and he was not in touch or sympathy with the then ruling powers. Indeed, he was more or less antagonistic to them. He had been promoted, not through the instrumentality of the oligarchy, but rather in spite of it, to the attorney-generalship in 1886, and although he was offered the governorship by the reformers or farmers in 1888, and could have been nominated, his affiliations with the then State administration were such that he was forced to decline.

This fact, in 1890, led the Reform Democrats to resolve to have nothing to do with any of the old leaders or prominent politicians of the State. The experience in two State campaigns—those of 1886 and 1888—in which they had been defeated taught them to know the value of early and thorough organization, so that the political forces of the State began to marshal themselves and politics to assume shape almost with the new year. A convention or voluntary caucus of those in sympathy with reform ideas was called to meet in March.

One of the principal demands in the call was for a primary election in which each individual citizen should have a right to vote direct for the nominees of the Democratic party. Another was the establishment of a technical and industrial school—an agricultural college for the education of farmers and mechanics separate from the State university. There were other important issues, but it is unnecessary to mention them. This convention assembled, and, denouncing the administration of affairs, passed resolutions announcing its platform and put me forward as candidate for governor in the party convention whenever it should be called. It also passed resolutions demanding of the State Democratic committee, which was controlled by our opponents, to appoint a series of meetings in each of the counties of the State for a general discussion of the issues of the day by all of the candidates for State offices. Thus was inaugurated, for the first time in the history of the State, one hundred years after the adoption of its first constitution, a joint canvass for the State offices. The people were asked to select their candidates, not to vote for them after the "ring" had chosen them.

The newspapers of the State, almost without exception, opened their batteries on the movement. Many declared that it was un-Democratic, and that its purpose was the division and consequent destruction of the Democratic party in the State. All of the trained politicians and men of prominence, with very few exceptions, aligned themselves in opposition. The banks, corporations, and railroads were all antagonistic. Out of 700 lawyers in the State not more than 40 joined in the movement for reform.

Senator, then Attorney-General, EARLE and Gen. John Bratton, a Confederate brigadier of high character, both announced themselves as candidates for governor, and the campaign opened early in June in Greenville, the county of General EARLE's birth. One meeting was held in every county in the State. Day by day, week by week, crowds numbering in the thousands and embracing almost the entire white male population turned out to hear the speakers. It was during this period of two months that I learned to know Senator EARLE thoroughly, to admire his ability as a debater, to respect his manhood, and to appreciate his gentlemanly, chivalrous bearing.

If there be such thing as—

> That stern joy which warriors feel
> In foemen worthy of their steel—

I had my fill of it. But candor compels the confession that while all of the indications pointed to General EARLE's defeat, the fighting, if such a term be permissible, was anything but pleasant to me. The contest was never in doubt after the first five meetings. A tidal wave had risen in the mountains and was sweeping seaward with irresistible force, bearing down all opposition, washing away all landmarks, and entirely submerging the old régime.

Democracy, like Pallas, new-born, but fully grown and armed, rejoiced in its strength and grew hoarse with cheering those who had first found courage to give it a voice and demand its rights. It had been suppressed and oppressed for a century, and nothing could now stay its course. The feeling was very intense, the danger of collision and riot always imminent. Dramatic situations, sharp personal colloquies, bitter sarcastic retorts, would first drive one side then the other into a frenzy of approval or angry dissent. General EARLE knew that he was beaten, but he never faltered or let up. He faced hostile audiences which sometimes refused at first to let him speak, but with calm dignity and courage he forced recognition and a hearing. He never relaxed his grasp upon my throat, but fought till the last. He pressed his arguments home with powerful logic and subtle reasoning.

A trained lawyer and debater, he had all the advantage, but the facts were against him. And while he made no impression upon the feelings or judgment of his audiences on the issues then pending, he yet won the admiration of all by his intrepidity and ability, and always under the most trying circumstances maintained his self-respect and commanded that of his opponents. There were 260 votes in the convention, and of these he received less than 50, carrying only four counties out of thirty-five. The county of his birth was against him, the county of his adoption was divided; but while he went down to defeat it was with every flag flying and no thought of asking quarter, and it was this canvass that won him his seat in the United States Senate six years later. I have always thought he entered the race under a misconception, but, being in, he was too proud and too brave to retire.

His line of fight during the campaign had been almost entirely personal. In other words, he did not dispute the justice of the demands which the reformers had set out in their platform, but he tried to get on the platform and shove its exponent off of it. He did not go far enough along that line to alienate the adherents of the oligarchy, who supported him with enthusiasm; but he was not their real choice, and he knew it, so he was careful to let the people see he was not opposing popular government and such reforms as were needed. When the result was known, after the nomination was over, he bowed submissively to the will of the people and loyally supported the ticket, advising against and antagonizing with all his might an independent ticket, which the defeated faction had set on foot to retain the government by the aid of the negroes.

After the last meeting at Colleton I approached General EARLE, and, extending my hand, I said:

General, we know each other better than we did at Greenville in June. If I have said anything in the heat of debate to wound your feelings, I desire to apologize, and to express the hope that if we can not be friends, we shall not become enemies.

He shook my hand heartily and disclaimed any feeling of hatred or sense of wrong, and offered a similar apology; and so we parted, as true men ought.

Two years later, when the reformers put me forward for reelection, there was another bitter contest, not so intense as that of 1890, but still very exciting, and in some respects dangerous. General EARLE refused to have anything to do with this and advised against it. He wrote a letter in which he gave credit where credit was due and warned his old supporters that they were doomed to defeat.

This enraged that element in the State at the time, but they learned later the wisdom of his advice and to appreciate the more his clear judgment, while at the same time General EARLE thus won the good will and forgiveness of thousands of those who voted against him in his candidacy for governor. The result was that the reform legislature elected him to the position of circuit judge in 1894, which he held up to the time of his election by popular vote at the primary and his entry to the Senate. Of this last race I shall not speak. Suffice it to say that I did not support him. But it was not because I did not know his worth and recognize his fitness for the position and his ability to adorn it.

After his entrance upon his duties here, our relations were friendly and promised to become cordial, for he had too much sense to bear malice and was too liberal minded not to know that my antagonism was political rather than personal. Had he lived so as to have given him an opportunity to have shown of what stuff he was made, I am sure every Senator here would have been impressed with his high character and chivalrous bearing and have recognized his worth and ability. He is gone, as all of us will have in a few years to follow, "to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns," and his fame and good name must rest in the minds and hearts of those in his own State, who knew him best and loved him most.

There is something peculiarly pathetic in his death, coming as it did just after reaching the goal of his ambition. A ripe scholar, an eminent jurist, and a fluent speaker, he could not have failed to make his influence felt here had Providence permitted him to win additional honors. The Senate pauses in its labors for a brief while to pay respect to his memory. The tribute which I have paid him, coming from an old antagonist, may not be deemed the highest or most worthy, but it is at least sincere; and I feel that I have but added to rather than detracted from the luster of his name by the recital of those events which first impressed him upon the people of his native State.

Mr. President, as we look around upon the Senate in our daily intercourse here, it is easy to be seen by everyone that with very few exceptions every man on this floor is on the sunset side of life and rapidly approaching the setting. We struggle here in the performance of our duties as we see them and understand them, and are often bitter and unreasonable in our contentions with one another, but I know Senators will join me with the utmost sincerity in the thoughts expressed in that beautiful poem by James Montgomery:

Time grows not old with length of years;
Changes he brings, but changes not;
New born each moment he appears;
We run our race, and are forgot.

Stars in perennial rounds return,
As from eternity they came,
And to eternity might burn;
We are not for one hour the same.

Spring flowers renew their glad perfume,
But ere a second spring they fly;
Our life is longer than their bloom,
Our bloom is sweeter—yet we die.

* * * *

Lord God! when time shall end his flight,
Stars set, and flowers revive no more,
May we behold Thy face in light,
Thy love in Jesus Christ adore.

I ask for the adoption of the resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the senior Senator from South Carolina.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 30, 1898, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 29, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE, ETC.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives 6,000 copies of the President's message, dated March 28, 1898, the report of the naval commission upon the explosion of the Maine, and the testimony reported by said commission.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution which has been adopted provides for the printing of the testimony.

The SPEAKER. It does.

CHRISTINE C. BARNARD.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 504, an act granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Christine C. Barnard, which has been returned by the Senate with the amendment nonconcurred in and a request for a conference. I move that the House further insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. STALLINGS.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION IN UTAH.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 199) to postpone the opening of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation in the State of Utah.

Resolved, etc., That the time fixed by the Indian appropriation act approved June 7, 1897, for opening to location and entry under all land laws of the United States the lands of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation in Utah, under the limitations and exceptions as therein provided, be, and the same is hereby, extended six months from the 1st day of April, 1898.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if that whole matter is not pending in an appropriation bill at the present time?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the same proposition pending in an appropriation bill, but unless it becomes operative before the 1st of April it is of no use.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment which I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] will not resist.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding: "Provided, That nothing herein shall extend to mineral lands other than gilsonite and kindred minerals."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is satisfactory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I desire to offer another amendment—to strike out the word "six" and insert "three;" so as to read "three months," instead of "six months."

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the gentleman will not press that amendment. The resolution in its present form follows precisely the provision of the appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. Very well; I withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposition as now amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the time fixed by the Indian appropriation act of June 7, 1897, for opening to location and entry under all land laws of the United States the lands of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation in Utah, under the limitations and exceptions as therein provided, be, and the same is hereby, extended six months from the 1st day of April, 1898: Provided, That nothing herein shall extend to mineral lands other than gilsonite and kindred minerals.

Mr. McRAE. As I understand, this proposition is simply to allow more time for the allotment of agricultural lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. McRAE. The Department, as I understand, will not be able to complete the allotments within the time fixed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary of the Interior has stated that fact, with the reasons therefor, in a communication which is embraced in House Document No. 335.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This resolution as read excepts, I believe, mineral lands other than gilsonite lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman is referring to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING] and adopted by the House, which was not a part of the original resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] what effect this provision will have on gilsonite lands after the expiration of the six months designated?

Mr. SHERMAN. It has no effect on gilsonite lands. Gilsonite is not affected. No legislation has ever been enacted in regard to gilsonite. That and kindred minerals have expressly been excepted in this and former legislation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I understand that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah does not affect gilsonite lands under the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It emphasizes the exclusion, that is all.

Mr. LACEY. Allow me just one moment. A question which occurs to me is whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Utah in its present form will not have the effect of limiting the limitation embraced in the resolution. That resolution includes two propositions. The first is to extend the time for six months; the next is a provision that the time be extended under the limitations of an act already in force which excludes gilsonite. It seems to me that in view of the additional language that the resolution shall not extend to gilsonite or like minerals the question might arise whether that language may not nullify the limitation of the original provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. The effect of the amendment is that the resolution shall not extend to minerals "other than gilsonite and kindred minerals."

Mr. LACEY. I ask that the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING] be again read, so that we may fully understand its effect.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. McRAE. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment will put the gilsonite lands upon the same footing as agricultural lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; I think the gentleman is in error. According to my understanding, the only effect of the amendment is to provide that this resolution shall not exclude from entry lands, for instance, containing gold and silver.

Mr. McRAE. The amendment provides, as I understand, that the resolution shall not apply to mineral lands other than gilsonite and kindred minerals.

Mr. KING. The object of the amendment is to provide that any mineral lands containing gold, silver, lead, copper, or other minerals shall be subject to entry, and that gilsonite lands or lands containing minerals of kindred nature shall not be open to entry. The statute now in force prevents entry upon gilsonite lands, and reserves the title thereto in the United States. This resolution does not affect them. Under the act now in force gilsonite lands are not subject to entry and will not be thrown open to entry on the 1st of April this year.

Mr. SHERMAN. Or at any other time under this legislation.

Mr. KING. The title to such lands is reserved to the Government of the United States. This resolution as originally reported simply extends the operation of the existing law with reference to agricultural lands for a period of six months. But upon those agricultural lands there may be certain minerals—gold, silver, lead, etc.—though none such have been discovered, so far as I am advised. The object of the amendment is not to exclude from entry after the 1st day of next month mineral lands containing gold, silver, lead, or minerals of that character, while at the same time not throwing open to entry lands containing gilsonite. I think that is clearly the construction of the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then, as I understand the gentleman from Utah, neither the original resolution nor the amendment which he has offered contemplates the opening up of the gilsonite lands?

Mr. KING. I answer the gentleman no, it does not.

Mr. McRAE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Utah if, under this resolution, he proposes to go ahead and allot mineral lands to the Indians?

Mr. KING. Certainly not.

Mr. McRAE. Do you, then, propose to work the mines before the allotment of the lands to the Indians?

Mr. KING. Under the resolution it permits entries of mineral lands which do not contain gilsonite.

Mr. McRAE. Before allotment?

Mr. KING. Before allotment.

Mr. McRAE. It seems to me that we had better open no lands at all, neither the gilsonite nor any other mineral lands, until the Indians are given their allotments in severalty, to which they are entitled under the law.

Mr. KING. Permit me to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that there is no opposition to this matter. I am advised by the Senators from Utah that it meets their approval. I do not know, of course, whether or not there are other minerals on this reservation than the gilsonite. But, in any event, this meets our approval and has been agreed upon as a sort of compromise measure. If there are any other minerals than gilsonite upon any of these lands, they are located at points remote from the agricultural lands.

And further, I will say to the gentleman that the agricultural lands are not being allotted to the Indians. As a matter of fact, this legislation is a work of supererogation, because the lands allotted to the Indians are being assigned from the Uintah Reservation and not the Uncompahgre; and even if we extended the time indefinitely for the allotment of lands upon this reservation the Indians would not take them, so that any submission to this legislation is simply a concession on the part of the representatives from Utah to the committee and the Secretary of the Interior. There is no probability of the Indians taking allotments on this other reservation.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, and there may be some misconstruction with respect to the language of this bill; and there are two negatives. In order to avoid any confusion or misconstruction, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment just adopted the words: "And such gilsonite and similar minerals, shall continue to be reserved."

Mr. LACEY. That would leave no doubt on the question.

Mr. KING. I do not think that would meet the object. Would not that exclude the entry of lead or coal mines?

Mr. LACEY. I do not think they are similar to gilsonite.

Mr. KING. Do you desire to add that as an amendment to my amendment?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir; in order to leave no question of doubt.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to it.

The amendment of Mr. LACEY was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House the business in order at this time, coming over from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2295) granting a pension to Mary J. Hart, of Quincy, Ind.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the Senate proposed to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title to read: "An act granting a pension to Mary J. Hart."

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment, which simply changes the title.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to give the House the regular order. The Clerk will lay before the House the unfinished business.

MRS. HANNAH LETCHER STEVENSON.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 439) granting a pension to Mrs. Hannah Letcher Stevenson, widow of the late Brig. Gen. John D. Stevenson.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hannah Letcher Stevenson, widow of the late Brig. Gen. John D. Stevenson, at the rate of $50 per month.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act granting an increase of pension to Hannah Letcher Stevenson."

The Clerk read the following amendments to the bill, as recommended by the Committee of the Whole:

In line 6, strike out the word "Mrs." before "Hannah."

In line 7, after the word "Stevenson," add the words "and pay her a pension."

In line 8, strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty," and after the word "month" insert the words "in lieu of the pension she is now receiving."

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Was not this day set apart by unanimous consent, instead of Friday last, for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was.

The SPEAKER. The Journal reads:

That Tuesday, March 29, be substituted for Friday, March 20, for the consideration of business under the rule which shall include the Friday evening session.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then the bill being considered is the unfinished business which should be considered on Friday?

The SPEAKER. It is business which is proper at Friday's session.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move an amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to ask the gentleman, who is familiar with this, how much time he thinks this bill will take?

Mr. RAY of New York. Why, it ought not to take more than fifteen minutes, but it may take a little longer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman if he will not consent that it go over until we dispose of the war-claim bill which is pending? I hope the gentleman will do that.

Mr. RAY of New York. Until we dispose of what?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The war-claim bill that is now pending.

Mr. GIBSON. I think we had better go on in the regular order. We will waste more time talking about it.

Mr. RAY of New York. This will not take long, and then you will have your time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the committee amendment on that bill, to strike out "fifty," in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof "thirty."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] moves an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8 strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, in behalf of this amendment I desire, without wearying the patience of the House, to state the situation and the proposition or principle involved.

The House is undoubtedly aware of the fact that by general law we have provided that in case a general officer dies, leaving a widow, his death being the result of his army service, the widow may be pensioned at $30 per month. That is the maximum sum allowed by law.

We have also provided by general law that in case a general officer dies, leaving a widow, his death not being caused by or due to his army service, the widow may be pensioned at the rate of $8 per month. This is the law written upon the statute books, and it is the result of the deliberation of Congresses heretofore. It has never been changed. In the case of the widows of privates, in the first case mentioned they get $12 per month and in the latter case $8, if dependent.

General Stevenson was a brave and efficient officer, but he was not specially distinguished in any line of duty. He served in the Mexican war and in the late civil war. He rose to the rank of brigadier-general, but his service was neither arduous nor specially distinguished. He always did his duty and did it well. He died recently and left a widow, Hannah Letcher Stevenson. Under the law, as written upon the statute books, she is entitled to a pension of $8 per month, which she is now drawing. That is the maximum permitted her by any general law upon the statute books.

Evidence was presented to the Committee on Invalid Pensions showing that she is now 77 years of age, and that she is poor. Her husband left her without property, and we were asked to increase this pension, the Senate having already passed a bill to that effect.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, after deliberate consideration, after careful investigation all along the line, after considering the principle involved, determined that in the case of a general officer leaving a widow now in destitution, where his death was not occasioned by or due to his army service, we would increase the pension of the widow to $30 per month, which is giving $22 a month more than any law upon the statute books will permit, and we regarded this as a wise and judicious increase.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the pension allowed to the widow of a brigadier-general killed in the service?

Mr. RAY of New York. Thirty dollars per month is permitted by general law, and no more.

Now, in addition to that, Mr. Speaker, we considered, in connection with it, the cases of widows of general officers whose deaths have been caused by reason of army service—that is, disease contracted or wounds received in the service of their country. We determined that in those cases, where the widow is without property and in necessitous circumstances, we would increase the pension to a sum not exceeding $50 per month.

We have pursued the same course in dealing with privates and lieutenants and officers of all grades when we came to deal with their widows and have found those widows in necessitous circumstances. We believe that the distinction made by the general law is a wise one, and we believe that that distinction should be maintained in all cases, so that the action of this House and the action of the committee might not only be wise and conservative, but consistent as well. In other words, we treat all in the same circumstances precisely alike.

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. LENTZ. I have heard several gentlemen say that the reason the $50 a month was voted in this case the other evening was because in all similar cases that amount had been allowed to widows. I only ask for information, to know whether that is the case, whether heretofore we have been allowing $50 and are now making a reduction, or whether this case is on a different footing from the others.

Mr. RAY of New York. I will answer that. I was just coming to that point. Those gentlemen who make that statement are mistaken. If any gentleman who knows the facts makes that statement, then he designs to mislead the House. But if any gentleman does not know the facts and makes that statement, then all I can say is he is mistaken, and I will proceed to state the history of this legislation in this House during this session and the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, because we have been perfectly consistent in this matter. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Invalid Pensions reported this Senate act to this House and recommended this amendment reducing it to $30 a month.

The question came up a week ago last Friday night in the Committee of the Whole, and when a vote was taken on that question the committee amendment was voted down, on a division, by 1 majority. Thirty-nine members present voted for the $30 and 40 of the members present voted for the $50; so that it was left at $50 by a majority of 1 in the Committee of the Whole with only 80 members of the House present. Now, what have we done heretofore in committee, and what has this House done? Let me call your attention.

The gentleman from California [Mr. BARLOW] is here and can bear me out in my statement, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARNER] is here and can bear me out in my statement, because they both have had bills reported to this House and passed by it; and those two bills illustrate this principle as well as anything possibly can. The first bill reported to this House to pension the widow of a general officer was that of Weltha Post-Leggett, and it was reported to the House on the 5th day of February, 1898. You will find it accompanying the bill H. R. 2349 (House Report No. 636).

General Leggett was a brilliant and magnificent officer, who served throughout the war of the rebellion. He commanded a division; he was in many battles; he was shot down on the field of battle at five different times, and still on two of those occasions remounted his horse and went through to the end without leaving the field. He also contracted disease in the service; and from the effect of those wounds and from those disabilities incurred in the service he died about four years ago, leaving a widow in destitute circumstances.

A bill was introduced in this House to give that widow $75 a month pension. The Committee on Invalid Pensions cut it down to $50 a month, and at $50 a month it passed this House. General Leggett, with his brilliant record, died of disease contracted and wounds received in the service. That is the first of these bills that passed in the House. Now, as to the second one on this line. The next report made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to pension the widow of a general officer was in the case of Brig. Gen. William A. Pile, a man who served all through the war of the rebellion. He had a most brilliant and magnificent record. He did his duty faithfully and fearlessly throughout the war, and he died leaving his widow without property or without money; in other words, leaving her in necessitous circumstances.

He was a general officer with a more brilliant record than General Stevenson. He took part in more battles; he endured more, suffered more, having had diseases of service origin; and he had wounds received in battle, which almost showed that he, too, died of disease contracted in the service. A bill was introduced for the relief of this widow by my distinguished friend from California [Mr. BARLOW]. He introduced a bill asking for a pension of only $25 a month for that widow in her necessitous circumstances.

Your committee when they looked into the matter and found that she was equally deserving with the others in regard to whom we were to act and had acted, and when we found that she was in necessitous circumstances, reported that bill one week ago at $30 per month, $5 more than the distinguished gentleman asked, and we did that in order that we might maintain a principle, in order that the action of this committee might be consistent and just to all these widows, and the House in the early hours of the session in Committee of the Whole last week (Monday) passed that bill giving that old widow, upward of 60 years of age, without a penny in the world and with no one on whom she could depend for support, $30 a month, and no one objected, and no one proposed an increase beyond that which was made by the decision of the committee.

The increase was confined to $30 per month because her husband, General Pile, had not died of disease contracted in the service or from the effect of wounds received in battle. Later on the same evening we reached the case of Mrs. Stevenson, the third case of the widow of a general officer reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The Committee, following its plan, acting on principle, endeavoring to act so as to be consistent in all of these cases, had investigated the facts and found that there was no pretense that General Stevenson died of disease contracted in the service or from the effect of wounds received in the service. He died at a ripe old age—upward of 80 years of age—and there is not a particle of evidence anywhere alleging the cause of death to be different. His widow filed her claim in the Pension Office asking for a pension, and she did not allege or claim or intimate, even, that her husband's death was due to army service.

Therefore, acting upon principle, and acting, as we think, wisely and conservatively, and, above all, consistently, we had reported a bill providing for that widow a pension at $30 per month. When the matter came to a vote in the Committee of the Whole, we found that this widow had some active friends at work on the floor of this House, and so they moved to disagree with the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and voted that amendment down; and it was done, as I have said, by a majority of 1, 39 voting for the $30 a month, and thereby sustaining the committee, and 40, a bare majority of 1, in Committee of the Whole voted to keep in the $50 per month.

Because of this action I bring this matter here to-day. I desire to know whether this committee, of which I am chairman, is to be sustained or condemned; whether our work is approved or disapproved by the House. It is my desire to merit the approval of the country and of every old soldier and soldier's widow in it.

The bill therefore comes here for action by the House, and I ask the House to sustain the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I trust the House will maintain the distinction. I request this House to be consistent in its legislation in regard to these pension bills.

If we do that, then our action will commend itself to the country, and to the whole country. If we so act, then whatever we do will commend itself to all the old soldiers and to all the widows of old soldiers throughout the length and breadth of this land. We may, if we do that, enact special legislation, give merited relief in special cases, and go to our homes without criticism; but if we act otherwise, in my judgment we will be criticised as a committee and as a House, and justly criticised.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. The bill now pending comes to us from the Senate?

Mr. RAY of New York. It does.

Mr. RIDGELY. They passed it allowing $50 a month. If we cut it down by amendment it will have to run the gantlet of the Senate again.

Mr. RAY of New York. The Senate will pass it. We have sent several bills to the Senate on this line, where captains, majors, and privates were concerned, and they have acted on them and sustained our action. We have amended their bills, and they have accepted our amendments without question——

Mr. RIDGELY. It will have to take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. RAY of New York (continuing). And they have amended our bills and we have generally accepted their action without question.

Mr. RIDGELY. It will have to take its place on the Calendar again.

Mr. RAY of New York. It will not delay the bill twenty-four hours.

Mr. RIDGELY. My experience is somewhat different. It will have to take its place on the Senate Calendar, and may not get back to the House during this session.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, no; the Senate will take it up and move to concur or nonconcur without its going on the Calendar, and in that event it will be acted upon immediately. If the Senate disagrees, it will go to conference.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from New York permit me a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has it been the practice of the Committee on Invalid Pensions at this session to fix the pension of widows of brigadier-generals at $30 a month?

Mr. RAY of New York. To fix at $30 a month the pension of the widow of a general officer, whether a brigadier or major general, it makes no difference; to fix at the rate of $30 a month where the death of the soldier was not due to wounds or disease contracted in the service, and not to go above $50 a month in the case where the husband's death, a general officer, was caused by disease contracted or wounds received in the service. In that there is a broad and wide distinction, as I have explained.

The general law makes a difference. Where a general officer dies and leaves a widow, and his death is caused by reason of wounds and disabilities incurred in the service, the widow draws $30 per month as a matter of law, and an increase to $50 in all those cases is given to relieve her necessities. The general law now gives to the widow of a general officer only $8 per month where death was not due to service. In this bill we are giving the widow $22 per month increase because of her age, because of her poverty. I think the gentleman catches the idea.

Mr. DOCKERY. I see your point.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Is not the pension of $8 a month a Mexican war pension?

Mr. RAY of New York. It is entirely immaterial whether it is a Mexican war pension or a civil war pension.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. It comes under a different law.

Mr. RAY of New York. It does not come under a different head or principle at all. In the case of the Mexican war widows and in the case of civil war widows, where the death of the husband is not due to service, the law gives the widow $8 per month; it gives that to the Mexican war widow and to the civil war widow. It gives $8 per month to the widow of a soldier who served in the civil war, regardless of the question whether he was a private or a general, when death was not of disease or wounds of service origin.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is a service pension.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; in effect that.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am satisfied the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] means to deal justly with all these claimants. I am not sufficiently advised to say that his position is incorrect in this case, but knowing of this officer, as I did in Missouri, knowing of his gallantry, ability, and humanity, I had indulged the hope that the gentleman from New York might find it consistent with the rules of his committee to allow this bill to pass as reported.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if the committee has adopted any rule in regard to the widows of colonels, field officers, and officers of the line?

Mr. RAY of New York. When we have granted an increase in the case of the widows of line officers, colonels, and majors, we have maintained the same distinction pro rata, and so when we have dealt with the privates we have maintained the same distinction.

We must do it, because it is absolutely unjust to place the soldier who was shot to pieces in battle on the same footing with the man who served in the Army and now is disabled to an equal degree, but who received his disabilities from some cause accruing since the war closed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the widow of a captain get $20 a month if he was killed in the Army?

Mr. RAY of New York. The widow of a captain would receive $20 per month. Widows of lieutenant-colonels and of all above that grade receive $30 a month as a maximum.

Mr. JOY. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly.

Mr. JOY. Does the report in the case of General Leggett show that he died from diseases or wounds contracted in the service?

Mr. RAY of New York. It does, and the report of the case of General Stevenson shows that he did not die of disease contracted in the service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the report in the case of Welthy Post-Leggett. I examined that case personally with the greatest care, with this point in view, in order that we might make no mistake; that we might not be accused in this House of doing an improper thing, of acting unadvisably, or of being inconsistent in our action. I read now from the report in that case:

These services were especially distinguished and meritorious. He was wounded five times in as many different battles, and also suffered from disease contracted in the service. And this caused his death.

Mr. LOUD. How old was he when he died?

Mr. RAY of New York. How old was General Leggett?

Mr. LOUD. I believe he lived thirty years after the close of the war.

Mr. RAY of New York. He was upward of 70 years of age when he died.

Mr. LOUD. That is to say, he died of wounds received in the service thirty years after the close of the war!

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, mark! He was shot down five times in five different battles. The evidence shows that at one time he lay all day on the battlefield, wounded. At another time, when shot from his horse by a bullet, he got up, and although seriously wounded, remounted, and rode in front of his men until the victory was won.

Mr. LOUD. That was a test of his gallantry, but——

Mr. RAY of New York. And he died of diseases contracted in the service.

Not so with General Stevenson. Let me call attention to one fact in the case of General Stevenson, and then I desire to yield a few minutes of my time.

General Stevenson was in the service for more than a quarter of a century, and for over twenty years he drew a salary from the Government, all the way from $3,000 to $5,000 a year. Of course we pity his widow in her poverty; but she will not suffer. She has friends to care for her and to see to her wants. And when this Government gives her an increase of $32 a month of the pension she has been receiving, I say we are generous. Above all, we should be consistent in our actions and treat all these cases alike if they are of equal merit.

Mr. JOY. Where in this report does the gentleman find the statement that General Stevenson drew from $3,000 to $5,000 a year from the Government?

Mr. RAY of New York. Every man on the floor of this House with ordinary intelligence knows the salary of a brigadier-general, counting in his rations, under the law; and when it is stated that he held such an office for such a length of time, we do not need to say in exact figures what he received.

Mr. JOY. That was while he was in the Army—not after he came out of the Army.

Mr. RAY of New York. Does not the gentleman know that he was on the retired list?

Mr. JOY. He did not receive from $3,000 to $5,000 while on the retired list, as every gentleman knows.

Mr. RAY of New York. Many gentlemen here know that he received about $4,000 per year if on the retired list, and the gentleman would know it if he knew anything about the law on the subject.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the longer a man is in the service of his country the more it detracts from his pensionable rights?

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman has not understood me to say any such thing, and he knows it. When he asks that question it is for "buncombe" merely.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. That is the inference I drew from the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. RAY of New York. "The gentleman" has not said any such thing. What "the gentleman" does say is this: That when an officer is educated at West Point—when he is taken in early life into the service of his country and remains there until the end of his days, receiving the large pay that this man received, and when he dies and leaves a widow, all that can be expected from this Government for her is a reasonable amount of help—a reasonable pension to afford her a comfortable living during the remainder of her days.

We should treat this as a business proposition, in order that we may be just to all the old soldiers and to all the widows of old soldiers all over the land; because, Mr. Speaker, there are hundreds, yea thousands, of widows of private soldiers and widows of officers of minor rank who are clamoring for an increase of their pensions. And many meritorious cases—hundreds of them—demand and receive favorable action.

Some gentleman will say there is no danger that this Government will not be able to pay all the pensions that Congress may vote. That may be true. But we must remember that it requires $150,000,000 each year to pay the pensioners now on the rolls; and while we should be generous, while we should take care of all these deserving people to a reasonable extent, we should be conservative, and above all we should so act that no one can say, "You have treated my neighbor better than you have treated me."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that on this amendment and on the bill I will ask for the previous question,

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. JOY. I trust the gentleman will not do that. There are two sides to this question, and we certainly ought to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has consumed thirty-one minutes of the hour. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RAY of New York. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. JOY. Well, I want to be heard, and other gentlemen may desire to be heard on this question. Thirty-five minutes have been occupied on your side, and there are certainly two sides to this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has occupied thirty-one minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri ten minutes.

Mr. JOY. I trust that will not be all that will be yielded to this side of the question.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, are there not two sides to this question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Does the gentleman from New York propose to consume the time for both sides?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman in charge of the bill always has control over it.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman does not desire to occupy the time given to him, I demand the previous question.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I am somewhat surprised to hear the statements which have been made by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions with reference to General Stevenson, whose widow is the beneficiary of this bill. I now state that Gen. John D. Stevenson was never on the retired list of the United States Army—never at any minute of time. The record shows that to be a fact.

In the second place, the report in this case is not in accord or in harmony with other reports from that committee. And the determination of the gentleman from New York to-day to cut this pension down from $50 a month, which was granted not later than last Monday night, to $30 a month simply arises from the fact that the committee—or not the committee, but one member, or possibly two, as far as we have been able to determine—want their action supported by the House at this time, when on last Monday evening, in the consideration of this very bill, when the question was taken there passed between the tellers to my own knowledge at that time not less than three Republican members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. They voted for $50 a month for this old lady.

Now, what are the facts in the case? This old lady is 78 years of age and past. She served with her husband through two wars—was with him during the larger part of two of these campaigns; she is to-day absolutely helpless, absolutely dependent on the charity of the good people of my own State and city; and I will say now that she will not suffer if she does not get a dollar of pension from the United States Government, for the old Union soldiers and the old Confederate soldiers will see that she is amply provided for.

But we only ask this pension in a sense of justice and right and equity to her. She has, in all human probability, only from two to five years to live, and we ask for her what other people occupying similar positions, with reference to the Government, have received at the hands of Congress. It is not much to give under the circumstances.

Of course it is unpleasant to the committee to be defeated on a measure of this kind, because the House in Committee of the Whole voted against their recommendation, and I could say, if I felt disposed, that on the day before this bill was reported I was promised that I should get a report at $40 a month, which would have been satisfactory. But it came in at $30 a month, which is entirely inadequate.

With reference to the necessitous condition of Mrs. Stevenson, we have affidavits here; one from Gen. John W. Noble, asking that proper provision be made for her, and showing that this old lady is past 78 years of age, absolutely dependent, weak, and frail in mind and body, dependent on charity in our great city and State; and now I insist that to vote down the provision of the bill and adopt the amendment cutting off $50 and substituting $30 a month would be absolutely unjust and inequitable.

This same amount was granted to General Leggett a few days ago, a man who, it is said, died from disease contracted in the service. He died thirty-two years after the war was over, and General Stevenson thirty-three years after the close of the war. Who can say, when at 80 years of age, that either of these men died of disease contracted in the service—that General Leggett died from any such cause? It is the period of life when it is appointed for all to die. It is the ultimate term of human life as a rule; and there is no man living, be he physician or layman, who can say with any degree of certainty, or even reasonable possibility, that a man of 72 or of 80 years of age died of disease contracted forty years before.

I trust, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the action of the committee, well taken, after full and mature consideration of this measure, will be sustained by this House and that the amendment will be voted down. This old lady, as I have said, has but two or three years remaining to live, and I trust that the House will do justice at last to the widow of General Stevenson. She is not now drawing a pension, and has never applied for a pension for the service of her husband in the late war.

Less than two months ago, at my request, she was granted a pension of $8 per month because her husband was a Mexican veteran. He was a gallant soldier through the Mexican war, as well as through the civil war. I trust, my friends, that we shall stand up, even against the chairman of the committee [Mr. RAY of New York] and vote what is right—only what is right, what is just, what is in accordance with all precedents—a paltry $50 per month to Mrs. Stevenson. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Has it not been the custom to grant to widows of generals this $50 per month?

Mr. JOY. It has for twenty-five years.

Mr. SIMPSON. Is not this a radical departure?

Mr. JOY. Yes. Frequently a larger sum than $50 a month has been granted, but not less than fifty.

Mr. SIMPSON. A few days ago we voted liberal provision for the survivors of the Maine, men who never saw actual service. Is not this a small thing to haggle over and take the time of the House, in opposing the giving to this widow of this old general the pension that has been given to widows of generals heretofore?

Mr. JOY. I think so.

Mr. SIMPSON. It is picayune work.

Mr. JOY. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. JOY. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague [Mr. PEARCE of Missouri].

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] has proposed consistency in this legislation. All I want this House to vote for is consistency. I hold in my hand the record of every single special pension bill that has been passed by Congress for twenty-two years in cases of this kind, and what does it show? It shows that the widows of six major-generals have been pensioned at $2,000 a year. They were the widows of Gen. George H. Thomas, Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, Gen. John A. Logan, Gen. Frank P. Blair, Gen. George Crook, and Gen. John C. Frémont. The widows of 23 brigadier and major generals receive $100 a month. The widows of 111 brigadier and major generals of full rank and of major-generals by brevet receive $50 per month and less than $100 per month. That is the record of your pension legislation. I incorporate the full list and dates of these bills, as follows:

An examination of the special pension acts which have been passed during the last twenty-two years shows that the widows of 6 major-generals receive $2,000 per annum, viz: Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, Maj. Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, Maj. Gen. John A. Logan, Maj. Gen. Frank P. Blair, jr., Maj. Gen. George Crook, Maj. Gen. John C. Frémont.

The widows of 23 brigadier and major generals receive $100 per month.

The widows of 111 brigadier and major generals of full rank and of rank of major-general by brevet receive $50 and less than $100 per month.

Forty-fourth Congress, first session.

Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Brig. Gen. Alexander B. Dyer (approved March 25, 1876)	$50
Elizabeth B. Thomas, widow of Brig. Gen. Lorenzo Thomas (approved April 13, 1876)	50
Mrs. L. H. Rousseau, widow of Lovell H. Rousseau, brigadier-general and brevet major-general, United States Army (approved April 13, 1876), increase from $30 to	50

There has been but one case where a pension bill has ever passed this House for the widow of a brevet major-general for less than $50 per month—only one in twenty-two years. The gentleman from New York speaks about the record of General Leggett. He was a grand and glorious soldier who served his country magnificently, but his record was no better than that of General Stevenson. I have procured from the War Department the records of both these men.

I have laid their records side by side, date by date, and incorporate them as follows:

Comparison from records of—

Maj. Gen. J. D. Stevenson (born Virginia June 8, 1821).	Maj. Gen. M. D. Leggett.
Captain Company E, First Regiment Missouri Mounted Infantry (Mexican war, Colonel Doniphan's regiment), June 27, 1846; mustered out June 24, 1847. In Missouri legislature, 1860-61. Colonel Seventh Missouri Infantry Volunteers, August 21, 1861. Brigadier-general, to rank from November 29, 1862. Brevetted major-general, to date from March 13, 1865; mustered out January 15, 1866. Commissioned colonel Thirtieth Infantry, United States Army, July 28, 1866. Commissioned colonel Twenty-fifth Infantry, United States Army, December 15, 1870. Brevetted brigadier-general, United States Army, March 2, 1867, for gallantry at Champion Hills. Resigned December 31, 1870.	Lieutenant-colonel Seventy-eighth Ohio Infantry, December 18, 1861. Colonel Seventy-eighth Ohio Infantry, January 21, 1863. Brigadier-general, November 26, 1863. Brevetted major-general, September 1, 1864. Major-general, August 21, 1865. Resigned September 1, 1865.

Was engaged in many battles and was twice wounded. Was brevetted for Atlanta and Savannah campaigns.
Was never reported as absent from his command.	Absent with leave, April to May, 1863; absent with leave, March to April, 1864; absent, sick, August to September, 1864; absent, sick, January to March, 1865.

HEADQUARTERS JOHN A. LOGAN POST, No. 304,
DEPARTMENT OF MISSOURI, G. A. R.,
St. Louis, Mo., March 17, 1898.

DEAR SIR: The following preamble and resolution were adopted unanimously by John A. Logan Post, No. 304, Department of Missouri, G. A. R., at a regular meeting held on the 14th instant:

"Whereas it has come to the knowledge of the officers and members of John A. Logan Post, No. 304, Department of Missouri, G. A. R., that a bill granting a pension to the widow of a late comrade of this post, the late Bvt. Maj. Gen. John D. Stevenson, has passed the United States Senate, but is as yet without action by the House of Representatives; and

"Whereas the late Bvt. Maj. Gen. John D. Stevenson rendered his country eminent services in the Mexican war and the war of the rebellion, and the widow of this distinguished officer is now in destitute circumstances and too old and feeble to earn a livelihood;

"Be it resolved, That the Hon. CHARLES E. PEARCE, member of Congress, be requested to advise the officers and members of John A. Logan Post what action will, in his opinion, secure the prompt attention of the members of the House of Representatives to the consideration and passage of the said bill, to the end that the few years yet remaining to the aged and infirm widow of our distinguished comrade may be passed in comparative comfort and ease instead of in abject poverty and misery."

Kindly comply with request expressed in above resolution.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants,
JNO. B. PRATT, Post Commander.
CARL MOLLER, Post Adjutant.

Hon. CHARLES E. PEARCE, M. C.,
Washington City, D. C.

This record shows that Gen. John D. Stevenson was engaged in the battles of the Mexican war, and that in the late war of the rebellion he was commanding brigades and divisions at Lexington, Mo., Boonville, Mo., Shiloh, Port Gibson, Raymond, Champion Hills, Jackson, Big Black, Vicksburg, Savannah, and Corinth, and that he fortified and held Decatur. He was never reported as absent from his command. He was congratulated, complimented, and thanked in the general orders of the War Department. General Stevenson's widow was married to him in 1845. She went with him and served during the Mexican war. She was with him and served all during the late war, stood by his side, and did her duty as he did his.

He was not wounded during the war, but is there a man on this floor able to say that a soldier who was not wounded in the late war necessarily did not perform his duty as well as the soldier who was? I was not wounded in the war, and yet I believe I played my little, humble part as well as any other man in the places in which I was put.

Now, gentlemen of the House, let me say to you that consistency in this pension legislation demands of you that you award to General Stevenson's widow the same pension as you have given all through twenty-two years of your legislation to widows similarly situated.

This bill passed the Senate without an objection. It came over here, and I tell you, gentlemen, that the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. RAY of New York] does not represent on this floor, as I happen to know, the sentiment of his own committee upon this subject. [Applause.]

I would not derogate, nay, more, I would pay all honor to the memory of that gallant soldier, General Leggett. I knew him well. I would do as much for the memory of Gen. John D. Stevenson.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says he happens to know that the chairman of this committee does not represent the sentiments of the committee. I happen to know that he does, and I happen to know that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PEARCE] has no warrant for making such a statement as he has just made. He does have warrant for stating that this rate of $30 per month does not represent the views of two or three of the members of that committee; but I state again that we had this very subject before the Committee on Invalid Pensions yesterday in regard to the widow of Gen. A. J. Smith, who stands on precisely the same footing that this widow of General Stevenson does.

The committee fully discussed this question and stood by the chairman, with only two exceptions. The gentleman should be sure of his facts before he makes such a statement. Her husband was a brave and distinguished officer, but he did not die of disease received or wounds contracted in the service, and we reported her bill yesterday from that committee at $30 per month. The bill, Mr. Speaker, was introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PEARCE] himself, and what he wants is to carry $50 here and then $50 there.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Why not?

Mr. RAY of New York. And then there are men on this floor that I happen to know who have bills of a like character, and they want to carry $50 for the widow of a general officer regardless of whether the husband died from wounds received or disease contracted in the service so they may get $50 for their claimant. The committee has been consistent all along on this line. The great majority are united and determined to be just and consistent.

Now, there was a gentleman on the other side who asked me for five minutes, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I feel that under the circumstances another fact ought to be considered in this House before we vote on this measure. I happen to live in a district that has a pension agency that distributes more money than any other pension agency in the United States. In that capital district of Ohio, I know that within the city of Columbus there are many women who are in a worse condition than soldiers' widows, because they are to-day compelled to take in washing or go from house to house to do washing or other service to help support their crippled, disabled old soldier husbands, who get no assistance from this Government, but have long since been deserving of the honor and help of having their names on the pension roll.

While we are economizing all along the line to-day, it seems but fair to follow the report of this committee, for by that means we shall save $20 a month on this pension, and that will enable us to pay $10 a month to each of two others as much deserving as this one. They say that in their judgment it is wise to put widows upon the pension roll at $30 a month where the officer has not died by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the Army. I think we ought to follow the judgment of the committee and not waste the public funds. No doubt this widow was devoted to her husband, General Stevenson, but the wives and widows of the private soldiers have been just as loyal and devoted to their humble husbands as were the wives of the officers. Let us not make the pensions so large for the benefit of the few. Let us be more just and equitable and distribute our funds to a larger number of suffering soldiers and their widows and orphans. I have no patience with granting large pensions so that the few may keep up what is called "social position," while the good old wives and widows of the common soldiers remain wash women because we are short of funds sufficient to pension the many thousands who now need and deserve help.

I say if you are going to be bounteous, and I am in favor of being generous—so far in favor of being generous to the old soldiers, their widows and orphans, that I want a service-pension bill passed here before this session closes, so that every living soldier who came out of the war with a clean record shall have his name upon a pension roll that shall indeed be a roll of honor. I say it is not timely to spend $50 a month in pensioning the widow of an officer and leave thousands of other women supporting soldiers who are diseased or crippled by reason of the services they rendered their country without any hope of future reward or distinction, such as was in prospect for the commanding officers. It may be well to consider the claims of the thousands of soldiers, their wives and widows, on the Treasury of this country, as well as the claim of the individual. Let us not forget the poor, for them have we with us always. For instance, in the State of Ohio two years ago we had 103,000 ex-soldiers of the civil war. Many, many of those men, to my own personal knowledge, from what I have seen, without going outside of my experience, are now needing and deserving a pension, but they have had no consideration, while every one of them ought to be on the pension roll.

Instead of parceling this money out to a few, let us be liberal and generous to the many, and by saving here a little and there a great deal, make a reasonable service-pension law in demonstration of the fact that this nation is determined to encourage in the hearts of its people the sentiment of patriotism and love of country. You can not do that by being too generous to one and too mean to thousands who have claims upon us. Pensions are a legitimate part of the war debt. To have appropriated a man's health and strength is as worthy of reimbursement by the Government as the seizure of cotton or corn from loyal citizens, but we pay pensions not alone in settlement of an obligation, but also to promote patriotism. If, however, we make unjust and unfair discrimination, if we show the lavish hand of partiality and favoritism to the few, we demoralize and discourage the many, and in the end defeat our best purpose by impressing the masses with the conviction that government by the people does not mean "equal and exact justice to all," but rather special privileges to the few.

Mr. RAY of New York. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the great difficulties that we have had in pension legislation by special acts has been that no Committee on Invalid Pensions has ever laid down any rules that we could understand until this present committee. They have adopted rules that we all understand, and they are following them uniformly, and I believe it is the duty of this House to sustain them in this matter.

If any general officer, or field officer, or line officer, as I understand the rule, dies the same as if shot down in battle, they give the widow as liberal a pension as they would if she was the widow of an officer killed in battle. Then if the widow of an officer not killed in battle, if dying of old age or other cause, they still give the widow more pension than she could get under any law upon the statute books.

Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PEARCE], with one of the warmest and tenderest hearts I know of, speaks of the beautiful devotion of this widow. I wish that speech could be broadened to apply to every soldier's widow in the Republic. [Loud applause.] My observation is, gentlemen of the House, that the wife of the humblest soldier was just as true to her boy in blue as the wife of the greatest general who led armies or divisions [great applause], and my judgment is that their tears are as sacred in the sight of God and their prayers will rise and be respected as much at the great white throne. We have not in our legislation been able to care for the great mass of widows, perhaps, as much as we should have done.

I remember that since we made the fight to raise their pensions from $8 to $12 where their husbands died of wounds received or disease contracted in the service there has been this feeling in every honest breast in this House, that we have always gone further than we ought to go in behalf of the man who wore the shoulder straps. That has been my own feeling, and I have never resisted it. And why? Because I wanted to feel that I cast my vote to give the poor widows of our brave men all that we could. We have now a fair scale in this rule laid down by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and for one, believing that that rule is an honest one—and I wish that it had been followed long ago—I shall vote to sustain the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the pending proposition.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of this House to one single fact, and then I shall insist on the previous question. I ask members to remember when you vote on this bill you will leave the widows of thousands of brave boys in blue who marched up to the mouth of angry cannon in equal or greater necessity drawing only $12 a month, while you give this widow $30 a month, nearly three times what we give to the privates' widows; and when we do this we are going as far as we ought to go. The amendment should prevail. Fifty dollars in such a case can not be justified. I insist upon the previous question.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 45.

Mr. JOY. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-five gentlemen have arisen.

Mr. JOY. I ask for the other side.

Mr. RAY of New York. How can the same gentleman who asked this division call for the other side?

The SPEAKER. Because he is interested in the result. [Laughter.] [After counting.] One hundred and thirteen—not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused; the ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the other night there were other amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were agreed to,

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act granting an increase of pension to Hannah Letcher Stevenson."

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. BABCOCK. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment. I ask unanimous consent that it be in order next Monday to consider business reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. As the House is aware, yesterday was District day, but on account of the condition of things I had no opportunity to make this request.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin intend to substitute next Monday, which will be suspension day, for last Monday, which was District day? I have no objection except that possibly there may be matters on that day which it would be desirable to pass under a suspension of the rules. With the understanding that District matters may be considered on that day and still leave in order matters that may be necessary to pass under suspension of the rules, I have no objection.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think there is no objection to that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that next Monday be substituted for District business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I now call for the regular order, and I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on House bill 4936 be closed at 4 o'clock, and that it be reported to the House and that a vote be taken in the House before 5 o'clock.

Mr. STEELE. Let us know what the bill is.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It is the bill with reference to the claims, commonly known as the Bowman Act.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that general debate has been closed and that we are now considering the bill by paragraphs, and that the committee proposes to move to strike certain paragraphs from the bill when reached. The matter will proceed very rapidly.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Does the gentleman think we shall get through with it this afternoon?

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand there will be no delay, that the matter will proceed rapidly.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The motion of Mr. GIBSON was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. PAYNE in the chair) for consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

OMNIBUS CLAIM BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar. The committee has under consideration House bill 4936, a bill for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and the Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Thomas J. Lavender, administrator of Jacob Lavender, deceased, late of Hempstead County, Ark., $991.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "Hempstead," in line 5, and inserting "Nevada." At the time this claim accrued Mr. Lavender resided in Hempstead County, but a new county named Nevada was formed, and he died in the new county. The administrator lives in the county of Nevada and letters of administration were issued in that county.

Mr. GIBSON. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To John A. Raine, of Hardin County, $644.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend that paragraph by making it payable to the personal representatives of John A. Raine.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is a general amendment to the bill that covers that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Very well, I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Odd Fellows' Hall Association, of New Orleans, $10,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to this particular case, and to inquire what the committee's report is in regard to it. It is desirable that there shall not be included in any of these claims any claim for the damage or destruction of property, as it is understood that only stores and supplies are to be paid for. I wish for an opportunity to look into this and see if there is any claim made for damages to this property, and therefore I will ask to have it passed for the present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We have no objection to passing it and recurring to it afterwards.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Mrs. Belle Osborne, executrix of John Osborne, deceased, late of Alexandria, $19,750.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that paragraph be passed over informally and taken up later.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why not move to strike it out now? It is understood that claims of this character shall be stricken from the bill.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 15, 16, and 17, on page 25 of the bill—the last paragraph read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Lowesky Bonvillian, of Terrebonne Parish, $900.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "Bonvillian" and inserting "Bouvillian."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To A. T. Snoffer, of Frederick County, $983.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to amend the amendment just read by striking out the word "Snoffer" and inserting in lieu thereof "Sneuffer."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To James Harding, administrator of James H. Maury, deceased, late of Claiborne County, $1,950.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting, after the word "James," the letter "M.;" so as to read: "James M. Harding."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Simeon Gilbreath, of Bates County, $369.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Simeon Gilbreath, named in the paragraph just read, is dead. I wish to move an amendment inserting before the name the words "the heirs at law of."

Mr. RICHARDSON. The committee have a general amendment which they propose to offer, covering all cases of this class, of which there are quite a number in the bill. It is not necessary to adopt such an amendment in each individual case.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Very well; I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To John T. Lynch, of Houston County, $150.

Mr. ROBB. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "Houston" and inserting "Texas." There is no such county as "Houston." The proper name of the county is Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To John T. Lynch, administrator of David Lynch, deceased, late of Houston County, $175.

Mr. ROBB. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the word "Houston" and inserting "Texas."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Benjamin Puter Bailey, treasurer of the Missouri State Lunatic Asylum No. 1, $17,250.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to inquire whether this is a claim merely for rent?

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman will examine the decision of the court, he will find that it excludes everything except rent.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the estate of Nicholas J. Bigley, deceased, late of Pittsburg, $21,211.50.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "to the estate of Nicholas J. Bigley, deceased, late of Pittsburg," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"To the heirs of Nicholas J. Bigley, deceased, late of Pittsburg, Pa.; Sarah McMeal, Joseph H. Bigley, Catherine L. Grace, Mary E. Smith, George Carrol Bigley, Susannah L. McCormack, Agnes Loretta Suter, Nicholas J. Bigley, and James W. Bigley, the sum of."

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] will correct his amendment so as to say simply "the heirs at law." This committee can not undertake to designate specifically who are the heirs of certain parties.

Mr. ROBBINS. The amendment which I have offered conforms exactly to the paragraph of the Senate bill. If the simple language "heirs" or "heirs at law" will be sufficient, I have no special desire to designate the heirs by name. But I should like this claim to be paid to the heirs of Bigley rather than to his estate, for the reason that this is a very old claim, having been adjudicated in the Court of Claims away back in 1888, and since its final adjudication Bigley, in 1890, died. The claim ought to be paid to his heirs and not to any administrator. It is true there has been an administrator, but he has already filed two accounts, and, so far as he has gone, has settled up the estate in full. I have here certificates from the courts of Allegheny and Westmoreland counties, Pa., stating that there are no legal liens against the estate.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. There is a general amendment, to be offered at the close of the bill by the committee, covering all such cases as this.

Mr. ROBBINS. What would be the effect of the amendment in this particular case?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It would provide for the payment of the claim to the legal administrator or heirs of the deceased party.

Mr. ROBBINS. Administrator or heirs?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The claim would be paid to the administrator, if an administration is pending; if not, then to the heirs.

Mr. DALZELL. There is an administration pending in this case, and the purpose of this amendment is to take away this fund from the creditors of the dead man and turn it over to the heirs, who have no earthly claim upon the estate until the claims of the creditors are satisfied.

Mr. ROBBINS. I question whether there are any creditors having legal claims. I say there is not a legal claim against this fund, according to the list of liens of the counties of Allegheny and Westmoreland. There is not one claimant who has brought suit under the statute law of Pennsylvania and preserved the lien of his claim by putting it in judgment or by filing a statement of the claim in the prothonotary's office.

Mr. DALZELL. My colleague must know that there is more than this amount outstanding and unpaid of the estate of Nicholas J. Bigley. I knew him in his lifetime. He was a constituent of mine, and I can say to the gentleman and to the committee that if he were here present to-day his voice would be the loudest of any man in this Chamber protesting against an attempt to take from his creditors the assets of his estate and turn them over to his children.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know about that. But if the claim is paid to an administrator, he would simply have the right to charge on the fund the fees which he ought not to have under the circumstances. The whole fund will then be tied up in court by long and expensive litigation between creditors, who have done nothing toward collecting it, and the heirs of N. J. Bigley.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, there is nothing in that.

Mr. ROBBINS. The heirs of Mr. Bigley are all of them in moderate circumstances and need this money. There are four of them who reside in my district. They are first entitled to this money, and I hope by this amendment to get it for them.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down, for if it goes to the administrator all of the rights of property can be settled in the local courts as they ought to be settled.

Mr. DALZELL. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if we can not proceed with this matter now, I ask that it be passed over without prejudice until the reading of the bill is completed.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, no; let us have the matters settled as we proceed, where we can settle them.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

To William McAdams, survivor of Marks & McAdams, late of Pittsburg, $43,251.25.

To Susannah P. Swope, of Clearfield County, $3,050.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment, to correct the spelling of the name, in line 6. The name should be "Swoope," not "Swope."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee, before we pass from it, to the paragraph just preceding that referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I call attention to the amount which is allowed in that paragraph—

$43,251. I have here the findings of the Court of Claims, and they find only for $12,000. There must be some clerical error, I apprehend.

I read from the findings of the court:

FINDINGS OF FACT.

This case having been heard by the Court of Claims, the court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, finds the facts to be as follows:

I.

On the 17th day of January, 1861, and on the 15th day of April, 1861, the firm of Marks & McAdams shipped from Pittsburg, Pa., for the city of New Orleans, La., three boat loads of Youghiogheny coal, containing 24,715 barrels of coal, which duly arrived in said city.

II.

In the autumn of 1861 the said coal was seized by the Confederate authorities and taken into possession and thereafter unloaded in a separate heap in a coal yard, established by and then under the control of the Confederate authorities, at Algiers, opposite New Orleans, where the same remained until seized by the Federal troops under command of Maj. Gen. B. F. Butler, in the month of May, 1862, at which time said coal was taken possession of by General Butler and his subordinates, and the same was consumed by military authority for the use of the United States Army.

III.

Said coal was worth at New Orleans at the time of its seizure by the Confederate forces about $12,000, but in May, 1862, when the United States forces under General Butler seized said coal, in consequence of the shipment of coal down the Mississippi River being obstructed, the price had advanced so that for a time the United States military authorities paid $1.75 per barrel.

So, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that the committee allows more in this case than the court finds.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. If the gentleman will follow the report, he will see the following language is used:

That at the time said coal was so, as aforesaid, taken by the said Maj. Gen. Benjamin F. Butler and his subordinates for the use of the United States, as aforesaid, the same was then and there worth the value of at least $1.65 per barrel, the whole value of the coal sold as aforesaid, taken, and used being then worth $40,779.75.

It will be seen in paragraph 3 of the findings of the court that they put the rate at $1.75 per barrel.

On page 2 of the report it will be seen:

(4) That the market value of the coal, and the price the Government was paying at the time, was $1.75 per barrel, or for 24,715 barrels, $43,251.25.

Mr. DINGLEY. But certainly the Government ought not to pay more than the coal was worth at the time it was seized by the Confederate forces. We want to do what is right and just in the premises, but opportunity ought not to be taken to get an extravagant amount.

I call the attention of the committee to the case. The understanding was that the allowances, in all of these claims, were to be those reported by the Court of Claims. That court reports $12,000 in this case, and yet this bill makes it $43,000 and over.

Mr. ROBBINS. Possibly there was something else in the claim.

Mr. DINGLEY. No; there is no indication of anything else. I have the report and findings of the court here. I felt that there must be some error made in the figures.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. That is possible.

Mr. DINGLEY. The amount should be $12,000, according to my understanding.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to pass this over informally and take it up later on, to give an opportunity of investigation.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have no objection to that. It ought to be investigated carefully, because this gives to this party $31,000 more than the Court of Claims allows.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to passing over the paragraph in question until the end of the bill is reached?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To S. B. Herbert, of Lawrence County, $425.
To David H. Hildebrand, of Shelby County, $963.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I am doing my best to keep up with the reading of the Clerk. I did not hear him read lines 5 and 6. I should like to know how they read in the copy of the bill the Clerk is reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

To S. B. Herbert, of Lawrence County, $425.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am directed by the Committee on War Claims to offer an amendment, striking out lines 7 and 8. It appears that this claim is in the bill inadvertently and should not be there.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 54, strike out all of lines 7 and 8.

Mr. COX. What is that amendment?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. To strike out the Hildebrand claim.

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to ask the gentleman why that is stricken out?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I am informed that this is not a claim of the character contemplated to be placed upon this bill; that it was irregularly or improperly placed there.

Mr. CARMACK. What is the character of it?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It is not for stores and supplies; and the findings are so indefinite that we can not determine that it is a claim proper to be placed upon this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Thomas M. Leneave, administrator of Irby T. Leneave, deceased, late of Maury County, $750.

Mr. COX. I want the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] who has the bill in charge. Let us see if we properly understand this matter. Take the claim in line 9, page 55, which has just been read:

To Thomas M. Leneave, administrator of Irby T. Leneave, deceased, late of Maury County, $750.

Now, here is the point. Thomas M. Leneave, who was administrator of Irby T. Leneave, is also dead. Under the amendment which I understand is proposed to this bill, to whom will that money be paid?

Mr. GIBSON. We have a general amendment covering all those cases, of which there are quite a number.

Mr. COX. The point I want to get at is this: If the amendment provides for the paying of the money to the administrator de bonis non?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.

Mr. COX. If it does that, then there is no question about it; but I do not want to commit myself to the idea that it should be paid to the heirs, regardless of the rights of creditors.

Mr. GIBSON. All the money goes to the estate, to be distributed by due course of law; not to the heirs, but to the administrator de bonis non.

Mr. COX. You keep the money in the line of administration?

Mr. EVANS. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

To James T. S. Greenfield, of Maury County, $695.
To David P. Atkinson, of Wayne County, $165.
To William P. James, of Marion County, $1,019.
To James C. Hodges, of Jefferson County, $319.
To Elizabeth McIntyre, administratrix of Robert McIntyre, deceased, late of Knox County, $198.
To Benjamin F. Owen, of Williamson County, $2,540.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask what the Clerk read, on lines 7 and 8, page 64?

The Clerk read as follows:

To James T. S. Greenfield, of Maury County, $695.

Mr. COX. And in line 18?

The Clerk read as follows:

To Benjamin F. Owen, of Williamson County, $2,540.

Mr. COX. That is all right.

The Clerk read as follows:

To W. G. Provine, administrator of James M. Provine, deceased, late of Shelby County, $8,625.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I am directed by the committee to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 66, strike out the whole of lines 19, 20, and 21, which read as follows:
"To W. G. Provine, administrator of James M. Provine, deceased, late of Shelby County, $8,625."

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to know upon what ground it is proposed to strike that out.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that this claim is not properly upon this bill, for the reason that when presented to the Court of Claims the court found the claimant disloyal. There were two findings. In the former finding it appears he was found loyal, but subsequently, in another hearing, they found that the claimant was disloyal, and being disloyal, that being a jurisdictional fact, the court could not inquire further. Therefore this claim is improperly upon this bill.

Mr. CARMACK. There were two findings by the Court of Claims?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Two findings by the Court of Claims, and the latter finding finds the claimant disloyal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the heirs of the late Mrs. Mary Ann Randolph Custis Lee, of Fairfax County, $217,280.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the claims about which there will be some debate. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over informally until the other matters in the bill are disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Kentucky that the claim just read by the Clerk be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To James W. Myers, of Jefferson County, $1,023.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out that claim, which is done on a rehearing of that case.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out lines 4 and 5, on page 75.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STEELE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 290. An act to increase the pension of William H. Webster;

H. R. 345. An act granting an increase of pension to George D. Cook;

H. Res. 182. Joint resolution providing for the temporary admission free of duty of naval and military supplies procured abroad.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. JOHN SIMPKINS, late a Representative from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

In compliance with the foregoing, the Vice-President appointed Mr. HOAR, Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. MALLORY as said committee.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIX, a Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 4127. An act to provide for dredging the channel in the harbor of New Bedford, Mass.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

OMNIBUS CLAIM BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the last line, page 76, the following:

"It shall be lawful for any judgment creditor of the respective claimants herein to attach or sequester the amount allowed any such claimant in any court of competent jurisdiction, and upon due and legal proof of said judgment, and that no appeal therefrom is pending, the same shall be paid out of the moneys so allowed said claimant, and if more than one judgment then the same shall be paid pro rata."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I raise the point of order on that amendment that it is not germane to this bill.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I think it is absolutely germane.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think that we ought to settle controversies of that kind between litigants. If they have any rights, we do not want to legislate in this bill for remedies of that kind. If the parties have any legal rights, they can obtain them.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. They have no such remedy in the United States courts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And I make the further point of order, before that is taken up now, that the committee have amendments which are to be offered, and which should first be considered. I hope the gentleman will wait until we get through with the committee amendments.

Mr. GIBSON. It will come in better afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will withdraw the amendment until the bill is perfected, it can be disposed of.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I am satisfied to allow it to go over until the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. GIBSON. The committee have sent up a number of amendments, which are now in the hands of the Clerk, and which I ask to have read next.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following:

"To John W. Belcher, administrator of John Belcher, deceased, late of Jefferson County, Ala., $220."

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish, before that amendment is put to the committee, to make an inquiry. As I understand, these amendments, although they would be subject to a point of order, are all findings of the Court of Claims for stores and supplies actually furnished the Army?

Mr. GIBSON. Every one of them.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no case of damage or destruction?

Mr. GIBSON. They have all been carefully scrutinized.

The Clerk read as follows:

To James A. Barton, administrator of Henry Ferguson, deceased, late of Walker County, Ala., $1,568.

To John W. Belcher, administrator of John Belcher, deceased, late of Jefferson County, Ala., $220.

To James A. Barton, administrator of Henry Ferguson, deceased, late of Walker County, Ala., $1,568.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. GIBSON. I move the adoption of the amendments, Mr. Chairman.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. We have passed page 71 of the bill by unanimous consent. I suppose that we shall go back to it.

Mr. EVANS. We shall come to it presently. There were several items passed, and the committee will take them up in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first paragraph passed over.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I ask for a vote on my amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A point of order was made on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, and the Chair has it there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that that amendment is germane where it is offered, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. LESTER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have an amendment made on page 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to return to page 16.

Mr. EVANS. What for?

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. EVANS. Let us hear the amendment.

Mr. LESTER. It is an amendment in line 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to offer the following amendment, which the Clerk will report subject to objection.

Mr. SWANSON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to return to page 16 for the purpose of offering the following amendment, which will be reported subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "Atlanta," in line 4, page 16, and insert the word "Savannah."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to the paragraph? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand the party lives in Savannah and not at Atlanta.

Mr. LESTER. That is the fact.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STALLINGS. I desire to ask unanimous consent to turn back to page 6, line 3, and offer the following amendment, which is nothing but the change of a name.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 3, page 6, by striking out the words "William H. Linn" and insert "William H. Linan."

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now turn to the first paragraph passed over. It will take but a minute.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Odd Fellows' Hall Association of New Orleans, $49,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, that paragraph was passed over for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was in it any element of damage or injury. I am informed by the committee that on examination they find it to be entirely for rent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, that is correct; but there is a typographical error in the bill as printed. The amount is $272.16 in excess of that stated in the bill, and the committee direct me to insert that amount, as shown in the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, line 11, strike out the word "dollars" and insert in lieu thereof "two hundred and seventy-two dollars and sixteen cents."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

To William McAdams, survivor of Marks & McAdams, late of Pittsburg, $48,251.25.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in lines 4 and 5, on page 51, by striking out all after the word "Pittsburg" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "twelve thousand dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS. On page 25, Mr. Chairman, is a paragraph that was passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Mrs. Belle Osborne, executrix of John Osborne, deceased, late of Alexandria, $19,750.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that that paragraph was stricken out.

Mr. EVANS. Yes; but I ask unanimous consent that the action of the committee in striking out that paragraph be vacated. There is no question but that half of the claim ought to be allowed. There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I move to amend, Mr. Chairman, by striking out the words "nineteen thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars" and inserting the words "nine thousand eight hundred and seventy-five dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the heirs of the late Mrs. Mary Ann Randolph Custis Lee, of Fairfax County, $217,236.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Strike out, on page 71, lines 18, 19, and 20, which is the paragraph last read.

When this bill was up a few days ago, there was an agreement reached as to the amount of time to be consumed in discussing this particular claim. I suppose the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] will control the time in behalf of the paragraph.

Mr. SWANSON. It was agreed that the other side should have five minutes and we should have twenty-five minutes.

Mr. EVANS. Then I trust the gentleman will occupy part of his twenty-five minutes.

Mr. SWANSON. No reason has yet been given, Mr. Chairman, why this claim should be stricken out.

Mr. EVANS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not able to give all the reasons why it should be stricken out in five minutes. I want to remind the committee of the fact that those of us who have been advocating the payment of the Bowman Act claims have done it upon these grounds: First, that the claimant was loyal; second, that the supplies were furnished by the claimant or taken from him; third, that the Army got the supplies, and fourth, that the amount due for them was ascertained by the Court of Claims. That is the only character of claims for which any of us have been willing to vote. I believe it will not be hard to enable the committee to understand this claim perfectly. The gentleman from Virginia was not quite accurate in his statement as to the time. Thirty minutes on a side was allowed; but the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, who had the bill in charge, expected to consume only five minutes in support of the proposition to strike the claim out. We may consume more than that.

Mr. SWANSON. That was the understanding—that we were to have fifteen minutes on a side—but he was to give me ten minutes of his time.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on War Claims has reported against this claim. It is in this bill inadvertently, and ought never to have been here. The committee itself has authorized the amendment to strike it out. Now, what are the facts? Mrs. Fitzhugh, the widow of William H. Fitzhugh, was the life tenant of 8,000 acres of land not far from Alexandria, Va. Mrs. Lee, the widow of Gen. Robert E. Lee, was the owner of the remainder. She owned the remainder under the same will. Mrs. Fitzhugh was found to be a loyal person. She owned, however, only a life estate in this land. It would have been regarded quite an insult thirty years ago if even my friend from Virginia had intimated, or if anybody else had said, that Mrs. Lee had not given some aid and comfort to the Confederacy. The suit of Mrs. Fitzhugh was filed in the Court of Claims upon a state of facts thus stated by the Court of Claims:

Mrs. Fitzhugh was tenant for life of Ravensworth, an estate of over 8,000 acres, near Alexandria, Va., under the will of her husband, William H. Fitzhugh.

Mrs. Robert E. Lee was vested with the remainder under the same will.

The Chief Quartermaster in 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865 caused to be cut and taken away from that estate 108,618 cords of wood. While this was going on the Secretary of War stopped it upon the ground that Mrs. Fitzhugh was an extremely loyal person; but when he was assured that the taking of the wood was a military necessity, the work went on.

Before resuming, however, Colonel Greene, the Chief Quartermaster, assured Mrs. Fitzhugh that it would be paid for if the loyalty of the owner was shown. This promise applied to 65,000 cords of it, which were taken after the promise was made. Mrs. Fitzhugh died in 1872, but her age does not appear.

The Court of Claims found that Mrs. Fitzhugh was perfectly loyal and that the 108,618 cords of wood were worth $3 per cord; in all, $217,236. But in the fifth of its findings the court used this language: "The court also finds that the value of the life estate—that is to say, Mrs. Fitzhugh's property, or interest as tenant for life in the wood so taken—has not been shown or established. There has been no appearance by or on behalf of the owners of the reversionary estate in these proceedings in this court."

Now, this case turns upon the question, What was the interest of Mrs. Fitzhugh, and what was her right in this timber? Every lawyer here knows that a life tenant has only what they used to call the right of estovers: that is to say, the life tenant has the right to cut firewood and to cut wood for the repairs of buildings; also to clear the land for the purpose of husbandry or cultivation. A life tenant has none other than these three rights in reference to timber.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Is not the holder of a life estate responsible in law for waste?

Mr. EVANS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McCULLOCH. And if this life tenant committed waste upon the estate, would she not be responsible——

Mr. EVANS. It was not waste committed by her. She is responsible only for voluntary waste.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Wait a moment. Would she not be responsible for any waste whatever that occurred during her life estate?

Mr. EVANS. She would only be responsible for voluntary waste; and, manifestly, this was not voluntary waste. Here is an attempt, which I think most of us recognize as ridiculous and absurd, to work out for Mrs. Lee a right to $200,000 for a remainder interest through the loyalty of a life tenant, Mrs. Fitzhugh. That is wholly inadmissible. I appeal to the sense of justice of every man here—I do not care whether he was a follower of General Lee, an admirer of Mrs. Lee, or whatever else he may have been—does the Bowman Act, do the findings of the Court of Claims, does common sense, justify us in paying $200,000 or any other sum of money to Mrs. Lee on account of damages resulting to this life tenant?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DINGLEY. In view of the importance of this question, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EVANS] be allowed ten minutes longer, if he desires so much time.

Mr. EVANS. I do not know that I shall use ten minutes.

Mr. SWANSON. And that the same amount of time be allowed on this side.

Mr. EVANS. You will have time enough, anyhow.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think there will be no objection to granting additional time on the other side if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I think I have developed to the satisfaction of everyone who has done me the honor to listen that the interest of Mrs. Fitzhugh in this property could not exceed in value $5,000 or $6,000. She was an old woman. Now, what was the value of her life estate in the timber, which, as I have said, she could only use for the three purposes named? The Court of Claims did not ascertain that. There was no attempt made to ascertain it. The trouble about the findings in this case is that they are not perfect. What ought to have been done? Measures ought to have been taken to ascertain the value of Mrs. Fitzhugh's life estate. Then, whatever might have been the value so ascertained by the Court of Claims, she would have been entitled to receive in person, or her administrator would have been entitled to receive it. But because she was a loyal person and owned the life estate, we are asked now to pay the reversionary title holder the whole amount of the value of the timber, although she was notoriously and, I may say, proudly disloyal to the Government of the United States during the war.

These are the facts of the matter. If we are going to confine ourselves to the payment of claims under the Bowman Act, we certainly can not pay this claim, because Mrs. Lee's interest in it, even if she were loyal, is not ascertained at all, nor was Mrs. Fitzhugh's. On the contrary, even if the committee had reported in favor of this claim, the findings of the court would not warrant us in paying it on any possible ground.

Having thus stated the facts of the case, I will reserve the remainder of my ten minutes until I hear from the other side.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to explain this claim, and I am confident that both sides of this Chamber, regardless of party lines or sectional divisions, will vote for the claim when it has been clearly and distinctly understood. I want to make a statement as to what this claim is.

Mrs. Fitzhugh was the aunt by marriage of the wife of Gen. Robert E. Lee. She was Miss Goldsborough, from Maryland. Her husband, Mr. Fitzhugh, died without any children, leaving her by his will a life estate in some lands across the Potomac River. Mrs. Robert E. Lee, who was Miss Custis (the daughter of the adopted son of George Washington), was, under the conditions of the will, to be the heir of her uncle, Mr. Fitzhugh, after the death of Mrs. Fitzhugh. When the war broke out Mrs. Fitzhugh, who was by marriage an aunt of Gen. Robert E. Lee's wife, was loyal to the Union. It is proven that the Sunday night before Gen. Robert E. Lee resigned his position in the Federal Army and went to Virginia to cast his fortunes with the Confederacy was spent by him with Mrs. Fitzhugh; that she insisted he should remain and fight with the Federal Army.

Now, Mr. Chairman, during the course of the war it was found that Mrs. Fitzhugh had a great deal of very valuable timber that the Government needed. It was the only timber, in fact, that the Government could get for the use of hospitals and to use for the various other needs arising out of the war. The Government issued an order directing the Quartermaster's Department to gather the timber on the estate of Mrs. Fitzhugh, and the work was done. She came to Washington and consulted with the Federal authorities as to this taking of the timber. On account of her loyalty, which was then established, they issued an order to stop cutting the timber on her land. Then Colonel Greene, who had charge of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States, wrote to the Department that it was impossible to get the necessary timber or lumber elsewhere, and that it was absolutely essential that they should get it, if at all, from the estate of Mr. Fitzhugh, or from her farm.

Under these circumstances they revoked the order directing the cessation of the cutting of the timber; and the Court of Claims found, as Colonel Greene says in his deposition, that Colonel Greene, a Federal official, entered into an agreement with Mrs. Fitzhugh that if she would permit this timber to be cut he would see that she would be paid for it at the rate of $3 per cord. He stated to her that he had the power to make that positive agreement with her—an agreement entered into distinct and clear covering this entire transaction. That, you will see, Mr. Chairman, was an agreement from the chief commissary of the Department of the Federal Army in this city; and the Court of Claims find that this agreement was entered into duly and lawfully; that Colonel Greene promised to pay her $3 a cord for the timber cut on her land, and the Government is responsible for the action of its agent, who was duly authorized to make the agreement. They went on cutting the timber under this order and agreement and took one hundred and eight thousand and some hundred cords.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. SWANSON. I would like very much to yield to the gentleman, but I have but a few minutes.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I only wanted to ask the gentleman if he does not think that Mrs. Fitzhugh was guilty of waste in entering into any such agreement?

Mr. SWANSON. Well, I will come to that later on.

This agreement, Mr. Chairman, has not been disputed and will not be disputed. It is nowhere questioned that the Federal Government, by its authorized agent, made an agreement as stated, and as sacred as any one that the Federal Government ever made, even to its bondholders, and which it has fulfilled by paying every dollar of the bonds. Colonel Greene said he had authority to make the contract; and if he had not made it this timber would not have been obtained, but they would have been compelled to get it somewhere else, as has been stated, at a very much greater expense to the Government.

How much did they cut? One hundred and eight thousand and some hundred cords were taken. They promised to pay her, as I have already stated, at the rate of $3 per cord for it—a specific agreement that the Government of the United States entered into.

Now, Mrs. Fitzhugh had to prove her loyalty before the court could take jurisdiction of the case. The Court of Claims for years and years have tried to disprove it, and came to the conclusion, irresistible and unquestioned, that, notwithstanding the circumstances which surrounded her, notwithstanding the trials and temptations with which she was beset, even the fact that her nephew by marriage, the great and brave and talented genius, Robert E. Lee, was leading the forces of the Confederacy with great distinction, with all of these influences she still stood true and firm and loyal to the Union.

Here, then, is a promise shown by this record of an agreement made by the Federal Government to pay her the sum of $324,000 for the timber taken from her lands. It is not questioned now that she was entirely loyal. The committee sent in their report at $2 a cord in place of $3, as agreed upon. Now the question is presented to the House, Shall a specific promise, made to a loyal citizen, be disregarded? Shall the Government refuse to execute its agreement made by a person competent to do so, simply because the beneficiary of that promise happens to be a child or children of Gen. Robert E. Lee?

In other words, shall we stand and vote here that the blood of Robert E. Lee, in this age of liberal ideas, when sectional distinctions and sectional prejudices have been obliterated—that his blood is so attainted that even his children can not inherit the result of any contract and promise made by the Federal Government for supplies? Because Mrs. Fitzhugh, who died about 1872, bequeathed the residuum of her estate, which includes this obligation, to the children of General Lee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all you have to do is read the findings of the Court of Claims and you will find the specific, distinct, and unquestioned promise made to Mrs. Fitzhugh that this money should be paid.

Mr. McCULLOCH. If the gentleman will permit me, as I understand it, Mrs. Fitzhugh died long after the war, leaving all that she possessed, including this obligation which had been incurred, to the children of General Lee, who are simply her heirs.

Mr. SWANSON. She died in 1872, I think it was. By her will she left the children of Gen. Robert E. Lee her residuary legatees, and all of the estate undisposed of was to go to them as the beneficiaries of the will, which would include this.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question is simply presented here as to whether we shall comply with our agreement. Here is a promise just as sacred, as fairly proven, as any promise to any citizen of the United States. It is admitted that the promise was made to a loyal citizen. The question is, Shall it be unexecuted because the beneficiaries are the children of General Lee? I do not believe in this age and time, when sectional lines have been obliterated, when narrow partisanship has been eliminated, that any section of the country or any set of men will stand up and antagonize this claim, but that on the contrary they will sustain the promises made by the Government, even though the children of Robert E. Lee shall be the beneficiaries. The Lees have ever been preeminent in the history of this country. There was never a crisis in its history that they were not prominent, patriotic, and great. They deserve this money by law, justice, and right.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. COX. I want to understand distinctly. Was Mrs. Fitzhugh the absolute owner of that property?

Mr. SWANSON. Mrs. Fitzhugh was the life tenant under her husband's will, but possibly the owner in fee under a deed by Mrs. Lee.

Mr. COX. Who were the remaindermen?

Mr. SWANSON. I have stated that the remaindermen were the children of Robert E. Lee, unless a certain deed that Mrs. Lee made to Mrs. Fitzhugh, before her marriage to Robert E. Lee, carries the fee simple in this estate to Mrs. Fitzhugh. If you will read the deed I think you will agree with me that it does. But the Court of Claims did not find that. That seems not to have been before them. But here is a promise made. Mrs. Fitzhugh had promised to permit this waste, to permit the cutting of this timber, provided she got $3 a cord for it. She is liable, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART] said, to the remaindermen for waste, having agreed to that.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Was she not liable to indictment under the laws of Virginia for willful waste?

Mr. SWANSON. If it was willful, possibly she might have been. But I want to say that she agreed to it, and she is liable to these children, and the Government agreed to stand between her and any damages to the extent of $3 a cord. Do you think that a great Government like the United States should fail to fulfill its pledges and promises made to a loyal citizen? There is no dispute about her loyalty. There is no dispute as to the amount taken. There is no dispute as to the price. The only objection made is the impression sought to be produced that the children of Robert E. Lee are so attainted, that their blood is so attainted by law, that they can not inherit property descended and given to them by a loyal citizen of the United States.

I do not believe there is a constituent of a man on that side of the Chamber or on this side of the Chamber, in this age of liberal ideas and brotherly love, and the reviving of sectional devotion and affection, who will sustain a man who votes against this claim, or who will say that the children of Robert E. Lee are so attainted that they can not inherit property from a loyal citizen of the United States, and can not be the beneficiaries of a promise made by the United States Government to a loyal citizen.

Besides, the United States Government, having agreed to pay Mrs. Fitzhugh, is estopped from now disputing her title again under the Bowman Act, and by the decisions of the Court of Claims the person's loyalty to be inquired into is that of the person who furnished the supplies or was in possession or control of the property, who was Mrs. Fitzhugh. Again, even if we ignore the deed made to Mrs. Fitzhugh by Mrs. Lee, yet the rights of Mrs. Lee's children as remaindermen were inchoate until after Mrs. Fitzhugh's death, which did not occur until 1872, and hence we can at the time of the taking of the timber consider only the loyalty of Mrs. Fitzhugh. Then, from whatever standpoint viewed, this claim is just, legal, and should be paid.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY].

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, all the claims in this bill which are now being considered arise under what is known as the Bowman Act, which provides that where the loyalty of the party is proven the claimant can recover for supplies which were furnished or taken by the Federal Army. I take it, therefore, that in considering this claim we have to measure it by the Bowman Act and see whether it meets the requirements of that act. The Bowman Act, in section 4, required that the loyalty of the person who furnished such supplies or stores or from whom the same were taken shall be established.

The person who furnished the supplies or stores or from whom they were taken! I ask this committee, judged by that rule, whether this claim is not a just and valid claim against the Government? Who was the party who furnished these supplies? Mrs. Fitzhugh was in possession of this tract of 8,000 acres of land. It was her home. She lived there, and when this property was taken she protested to the Secretary of War. He ordered the depredations to stop. Finally, when it was found to be a matter of necessity, when wood could not be obtained from any other source for less than $8 to $11 a cord, the Secretary of War said, "We will take that wood," and he authorized the Quartermaster-General, as he himself says, to make a contract with Mrs. Fitzhugh to pay her for this wood. General Greene testified that he made this contract; and not only that he made it, but that he would have paid her if he had not been ordered to New Orleans, so that he did not have the opportunity.

Again, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EVANS] said that General Greene testified that he would pay Mrs. Fitzhugh if the loyalty of the owner was established. I have here the testimony of Colonel Greene, who said that he would pay Mrs. Fitzhugh if her loyalty was established. That was a contract. The loyalty of anybody else did not enter into the question. They seemed to know what the provisions of the Bowman Act would be, or what the people of this country would require. Colonel Greene said he would pay Mrs. Fitzhugh if her loyalty was established, and I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the contract was as to the loyalty of Mrs. Fitzhugh, and not as to the loyalty of anybody else.

To show you that that is the proper construction, I have in my hand the Newman Case, found in 21 Court of Claims Reports. In that case a citizen of Mississippi died just before the war. The executor qualified upon his estate. At the time of his death he left a widow and three or four infant children, the eldest of whom at the close of the war was 13 years of age. After the war was over the widow and her children filed their petition under the Bowman Act for compensation for the supplies which had been furnished. What does the court find? It says it is true that these infants were loyal; that they could not commit a disloyal act; that they were the owners of the property; and yet the Court of Claims said that under the Bowman Act the only party whose loyalty could be inquired into was the life tenant, the party in possession. The party in possession in that case was the executor, who had no claim whatsoever to the property except the legal possession of it.

The court refused to allow the claim of these infant children, who were the owners of the property, upon the ground that the party in possession, the executor, was not loyal to the Government. That is the Newman claim, reported in 21 Court of Claims Reports.

I want to say to this committee that we are not here to write the Bowman Act over again; we are not here to say what the Bowman Act should have been, but to apply it to this case.

The Bowman Act required only that the loyalty of the person who furnished the supplies should be inquired into, and under that law and the decision of the court I say there never has been a claim which appeals more to justice and to the sense of the country than does this claim. It is established by positive contract, unlike many of the other claims reported in this bill which depend simply on testimony that the property was taken without their consent and that they were loyal. We stand here upon a contract by which the Quartermaster-General agreed to pay this money if the loyalty of Mrs. Fitzhugh was established. That has been done, and I simply——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like to ask the gentleman one or two questions. Who was the owner of this property at the time?

Mr. RIXEY. Mrs. Fitzhugh was in possession.

Mr. BRUMM. Who had the title?

Mr. SETTLE. You mean the legal title.

Mr. RIXEY. Mrs. Fitzhugh was the life tenant of this property, and she lived on it until 1872.

Mr. BRUMM. Had she the right to cut the timber while she was a life tenant?

Mr. RIXEY. If she did it, she would be personally liable.

Mr. BRUMM. But had she the title to the timber while she was a life tenant?

Mr. SWANSON. The General Government took it under promise to pay her.

Mr. BRUMM. That does not answer my question.

Mr. RIXEY. Under the Bowman Act——

Mr. SWANSON. If the Federal Government takes it from her and recognizes her title, they are estopped from disputing it when they agree to pay her for it.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST].

Mr. YOST. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we ought to judge this case by the same rule that we judge other cases which come up under this act. The first question to be decided under the Bowman Act, as I understand, is as to the loyalty of the claimant. This is a preliminary question. When this identical case came up, the question arose as to whose loyalty was to be inquired into; and the court considered that, and decided it was the loyalty of the person from whom the property was taken; and in this case that person was Mrs. Fitzhugh.

Her loyalty was then inquired into and absolutely determined. The next questions to be determined were: First, Was the property taken and used by the Government? And second, What was the value of that property? The court inquired into and determined both of these questions, and its findings are not disputed. The case is thus brought clearly within the provisions of the Bowman Act. All the provisions of the law have been complied with.

Mr. BRUMM. Now, one thing about this matter of fact. That Mrs. Fitzhugh was in possession is undisputed. She was, as I understand, the life tenant. The fact that a contract was made with her for a portion of this timber is undisputed. The fact I want to get at is this: Had she such a title to the timber on the land that would make the sale of that timber an absolute sale? I want to get information upon that point.

Mr. YOST. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman, I would say that I believe she did have such title.

Mr. BRUMM. What do you know about it? Can you give us the facts?

Mr. EVANS. What did the court find?

Mr. YOST. The Court of Claims did not find that she had. Here is a deed, however, that is worth considering. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to listen one moment, and I think I can make that clear to him. Mrs. Fitzhugh believed all her life, I am advised, that she was the fee-simple owner, and she had a right to believe it. Under the will of her husband, made in 1829, she inherited a life interest in the Ravensworth estate, from which this wood was cut, with remainder to Miss Custis. In 1830 Miss Custis, who subsequently married Gen. Robert E. Lee, entered into an agreement with Mrs. Fitzhugh by which she conveyed to her certain interests, including, it seems to me, this reversion.

Mr. BRUMM. Do you mean to tell me that she had no title in the timber and that it afterwards reverted to her?

Mr. YOST. Oh, no; this was made in 1830. Mr. Fitzhugh died in 1829, and left this estate for life to Mrs. Fitzhugh, with remainder to Miss Custis. In 1830 Miss Custis made a deed back to Mrs. Fitzhugh.

Mr. BRUMM. Under the law of Virginia, does a life estate give the tenant for life the right to cut timber unlimited?

Mr. YOST. Oh, no. But that is not the question here. You are getting at something else. Let me read the provisions of the deed.

Mr. COX. What deed are you talking about?

Mr. YOST. I am talking about the deed from the remainderman back to Mrs. Fitzhugh, made in 1830. It reads as follows:

Now this indenture witnesseth that the said Mary Anna Randolph Custis, in order to contribute to the personal resources of her aunt, the said Anna Maria Fitzhugh, to confirm, assure, and render unquestionable the power given or intended to be given to her by the said will to sell and convey in fee simple and thus convert all or any portion of the said trust fund, whether real or personal, into money at such times and in such modes as she may deem best; to secure the said Anna Maria Fitzhugh against any responsibility to other persons to whom the uncertainty of life might hereafter give a right to claim of her an account of the said trust, and in the consideration of the sum of $1 by the said Anna Maria to the said Mary in hand paid, doth hereby grant, bargain and sell, assign, release, and convey to the said Anna Maria, her heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and interest in reversion of the said Mary in and to all and singular the personal property attached to the "Ravensworth estate" and devised to the said Anna Maria for life, as aforesaid, and also all the right, title, interest, and estate of her, the said Mary which she now hath or hereafter may have in and to all and every part of the trust estate created by the will of the said William H. Fitzhugh, as aforesaid, including the lands in Stafford, Fairfax, and elsewhere, and all and singular the personalties embraced by him in the said trust, excepting, however, the legacy of $1,000 devised to her, the said Mary, by her uncle, the said William H. Fitzhugh, as to which legacy the right under the said will and her security and claim on the trust fund are reserved wholly unimpaired.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Was that deed ever set aside in any way?

Mr. YOST. It was not.

Mr. COX. What is your conclusion about that?

Mr. YOST. My conclusion is that Mrs. Fitzhugh was really the owner.

Mr. BRUMM. If that fact is established, your claim is a good one; but we ought to have some light on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. YOST. Let me have one minute more.

Mr. SWANSON. The time on the other side has been extended ten minutes, and I ask that the time on this side be extended for the same length of time.

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST].

Mr. YOST. Now, when this agreement which has been adverted to was made by General Greene with Mrs. Fitzhugh, he would have paid the money to her. He says he would have paid the money to her, but he found it impossible to make up the account. He had no question about the loyalty, and there was no question then raised as to the fact that this was a contract with her. He said himself, in his testimony, "I found it impossible, indeed, to make up the account owing to the pressure of business, so I never paid her anything. I was fully authorized and empowered to do so by my official instructions as quartermaster, but there was always involved the question of the loyalty of the owner," though——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SWANSON. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman—fourteen minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eleven minutes left.

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield that time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with my colleagues who have spoken in support of this claim, that the loyalty which is required to be established under the Bowman Act is the loyalty, in this case, of Mrs. Fitzhugh. I think the language of the act itself is too plain to be misconstrued, and even if the language of the law was less clear than it is, the Court of Claims in the Neuman case, reported in twenty-first volume Court of Claims, has decided that the person whose loyalty must be established is that one who was properly in possession of the property taken and having a financial interest therein. Mrs. Fitzhugh came squarely within that definition. She was in possession of the property when it was taken and she had an interest therein. It may not have been a fee-simple interest, but it was an interest nevertheless.

But, Mr. Chairman, even if that were not true, I think there ought not to be any question on the part of any member of this House as to the payment of this just claim. There is no question, there can be none, that the property taken was needed by the United States Government and that it was actually used by the Government. There can be no question that it was of the full value that the Court of Claims found it to be. It being admitted that this property was received and used by the Government, and that its value has not been overestimated by the Court of Claims, somebody is entitled to and ought to be paid for it. The question of loyalty is, under the Bowman Act, merely one of jurisdiction. It does not go to, and can not affect, the merits of the claim itself. Those merits having been established by a competent tribunal, the question now is, Ought this great Government to pay a claim against it that has been fully established by its own court?

The Bowman Act gives to the Court of Claims the right to consider only such claims for supplies or stores as are presented by loyal claimants. Before the court can consider any claim under this act it must be satisfied that the claimant was loyal to the cause of the Union, and the court was so satisfied in this case, holding that the loyalty to be established was the loyalty of Mrs. Fitzhugh. But, whether this claim got before the court properly or not, it got there, and, having gotten there, received the same painstaking consideration which would have been given it had the loyalty of every person interested in it in the remotest degree been fully established.

Now, my contention is that, inasmuch as the court has taken jurisdiction of this claim, inasmuch as it has found that this property was taken and used, and was of a certain value, it is too late now to object that it got before the court which considered it when the real claimants were not shown to have been loyal. That was merely a jurisdictional question, and even if the court erred in regard thereto it is not contended that it erred in any other one of its findings. Even should this House believe that the Court of Claims was mistaken in taking jurisdiction of this claim it must be satisfied that its findings as to the facts upon which the claim is based are correct, and being satisfied that the claim is an absolutely just one, it should not refuse to pay it. In my judgment the court properly assumed jurisdiction over this claim, but whether it did or not in no wise detracts from the justness of the claim itself.

The Court of Claims has considered and passed upon the merits of this claim and its findings are entitled to the same weight in this House as they would be if no question were raised here in relation to the jurisdiction of the court. The facts are now before this House and there is no statute which forbids Congress to pay a just claim against the United States merely because all those interested in its payments were not loyal to the Union a third of a century ago.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not concede for a moment that the Court of Claims had not jurisdiction of the claim. I do not concede for a moment that it assumed a jurisdiction not conferred upon it. I only contend that gentlemen who so believe ought not to vote against the payment of the claim if they are convinced, as they must be, that it is just and honest. It would be an outrage upon justice to refuse to pay this claim upon the bare ground that the Bowman Act did not confer authority upon the Court of Claims to consider it. It would be an act of the greatest injustice to withhold payment of this claim upon the sole ground that those who will now be benefited thereby are the children and the grandchildren of Robert E. Lee.

But, whatever may be the views of gentlemen upon this point, there is another aspect of the case to which I desire briefly to call their attention. Mrs. Fitzhugh's loyalty is conceded. When the chief quartermaster at Washington was cutting the timber from the land of which she was the life tenant, she appealed to the Secretary of War and secured from him an order forbidding any further cutting. This order was revoked upon the representation of the chief quartermaster that it was a military necessity that the wood should be cut. Then it was that the quartermaster promised and agreed to pay to Mrs. Fitzhugh $3 for every cord of wood cut by him.

It is conceded that under this agreement 65,000 cords were actually cut and taken away by the Government. Under this agreement the Government would have paid to Mrs. Fitzhugh $190,000 had not the quartermaster been ordered away from Washington. It may be true that as life tenant Mrs. Fitzhugh could not have sold this timber, but the Government regarded her as the rightful owner and promised to pay her for it. She was never paid in her lifetime, and if she should be paid now the heirs of Mrs. Lee would have the right to recover the money from her representatives. If this be true, why should not Congress pay the $190,000 directly to these heirs? Is it right, and does it comport with the dignity and the honor of this Government, to avail itself of a technicality to defeat the payment of so just a claim as this?

If you will not recognize the claim of the heirs of Mrs. Robert E. Lee because it is not claimed that she was loyal to the Union, then recognize the solemn contract that was made with Mrs. Fitzhugh, a loyal woman. Unless you repudiate that contract, you must pay the heirs of Mrs. Lee $190,000. We have the testimony of the chief quartermaster himself that the timber could not have been purchased elsewhere for what he agreed to pay Mrs. Fitzhugh, who is admitted to have been loyal to the Union cause.

Mr. SWANSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to state one point which I forgot when on the floor. It is stated here in the report that Colonel Greene had full authority to make this contract; and the reason he did not pay Mrs. Fitzhugh was that he was suddenly called away to New Orleans in the discharge of his duties; otherwise he would have paid her.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. My colleague [Mr. RIXEY] made that statement. The contract was made by the chief quartermaster, who testifies, as gentlemen have heard from the reading of the report, that he had full and absolute authority to make the contract and that every dollar of this money would have been paid to Mrs. Fitzhugh if he had not been called away. Suppose, for the sake of the argument, that contract had been carried out; suppose that money had been actually paid to Mrs. Fitzhugh; suppose she had received what of right belonged to Mrs. Lee, who will say that the heirs of Mrs. Lee could not——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I shall consume but a portion of the time remaining. I want to recapitulate the points in the case.

This particular provision of the pending bill was inserted inadvertently. It was never authorized by the committee. The Committee on War Claims has distinctly reported—unanimously, I believe—in favor of striking it out. Furthermore, in endeavoring to be perfectly fair about all these claims it has never entered into anybody's head that there should be any question along the lines of political affiliation. The first question is as to the loyalty of the claimant. Now, I have, for the sake of argument, followed the findings of the Court of Claims on this subject, although the Southern Claims Commission very strongly urged that Mrs. Fitzhugh was not loyal. But basing all the argument I have made upon the findings of the Court of Claims, I am willing to concede that she was loyal.

The second question is, Did she furnish these supplies? I say she did not. The Court of Claims has distinctly decided that she did not furnish the wood herself. It was not her property. The wood which was furnished was the wood of somebody else. And who was that somebody else? The wife of Gen. Robert E. Lee. And I say nobody here will contend that she was ever loyal. And I want to state emphatically that no heir of Robert E. Lee and no heir of Mrs. Robert E. Lee has made any claim or ever will make any claim to this money. So that this talk about dishonoring the children of Robert E. Lee and declaring them not to have heritable blood is absurd.

Mr. SWANSON. Does not the gentleman know that the Court of Claims found that there was a specific agreement made with Mrs. Fitzhugh to pay her at the rate of $3 a cord for this wood?

Mr. EVANS. I know what the findings of the Court of Claims were, and I must insist on not being interrupted in this way. The Court of Claims found—and this is an essential fact—that while certain cords of wood—a large number of them—were furnished, that wood was not Mrs. Fitzhugh's property at all. The only promise that the officers of the Government could possibly have been construed to make was that they would pay Mrs. Fitzhugh for that which was hers, not for that which was the property of somebody else. The Court of Claims winds up with this statement, which I think is sufficient to dispose of this whole controversy:

V

The court also finds that the value of the life estate, that is to say, of Mrs. Fitzhugh's property or interest as tenant for life in the wood so taken, has not been shown or established.

That is what the court says about it. Her interest—the value of it—has never been established.

The deed from which my distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. YOST] read was part of the evidence presented before the Court of Claims in the case. But that deed, as my friend himself would hold if he were deciding this case as a judge, did not convey to Mrs. Fitzhugh the reversionary interest of this real estate. For some purpose or other there was certain personal property embraced in that deed, which was described as being on the estate. That was all. It did not embrace the timber, which was part of the realty.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. EVANS. No, I can not yield. I did not interrupt my friend when he was occupying the floor.

That deed, read by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. YOST], was before the Court of Claims; and the court had to construe it. The court did construe that deed, and still held—and held properly—that only the life estate in this property was in Mrs. Fitzhugh. What did she transfer to the Government, and what did the Government get from her? Absolutely nothing, except the value of her right of estovers in this property, which could not have amounted to $5,000 in the value at the very outside, because she was 76 years of age when she died, in 1872.

Mr. Chairman, it is clear and certain that Mrs. Fitzhugh furnished very little to the Government of property that belonged to her. What was taken was mostly the property of General Lee's wife. There is nothing to show that the $215,000 attempted to be appropriated should properly be paid to Mrs. Fitzhugh or to her administrator. On the contrary, no one attempts to show what the value of her interest was in this property. How absurd it would be, then, for this House to vote this money to the administrator or heirs of Mrs. Lee upon the pretense that the life tenant was loyal; and not less indefensible would be the yielding to what is really only a subtle attempt to appropriate money for the benefit of General and Mrs. Lee's heirs through the loyalty of Mrs. Fitzhugh. In other words, the claim of the loyal Mrs. Fitzhugh, which would not exceed $5,000, is to be expanded to over $215,000 for the benefit of the Lee heirs, who have never claimed a dollar of it.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EVANS. Certainly; I will yield for a question?

Mr. BRUMM. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact under the law that Mrs. Fitzhugh had simply the right of estovers; and if the claim was paid to her and it afterwards turned out that the heirs of Robert E. Lee had a title in fee simple, and it could be ascertained that they were loyal to the Government during that time, could they not also come in and make a claim for the same property, in which event the Government would be responsible for a double payment?

Mr. EVANS. Why, unquestionably. But these heirs have never asserted any claim whatever. The court has only found that the value of Mrs. Fitzhugh's life interest in the claim has never been proved, ascertained, or established. How, then, does this appropriation of $200,000 stand justified before this House on a finding of the Court of Claims which says that notwithstanding she was loyal, notwithstanding the fact that certain timber was taken by the Government and used by the Army, still that her interest in the estate was never established or determined further than it was a life estate in the land from which the timber was taken?

Now, Mr. Chairman, do not let anybody who wants to do right by the Government be deluded into voting an appropriation of over $200,000 to people who never applied for it, simply because they are heirs of the distinguished dead.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Is this not a case where the right of estovers is presented?

Mr. EVANS. Absolutely. The only waste for which a life tenant is responsible is voluntary waste—waste by his own voluntary act. How, then, could he be responsible for damage by trespass? Especially how could Mrs. Fitzhugh be held liable for the acts of the Government of the United States, with all of its vast power and all of its vast army, which she could not resist?

I call for a vote.

Mr. BRUMM. The writ of estrepement or waste would lie against her title if she had committed waste.

Mr. EVANS. Undoubtedly.

I ask a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky to strike out this provision of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SWANSON), there were—ayes 95, noes 82.

Mr. SWANSON, Mr. JONES of Virginia, and others demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. SWANSON and Mr. EVANS as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 81.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. I give notice that I will call for a yea-and-nay vote in the House on this.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add a new section, to be known as section 2, as follows:
"In case of the death or discharge of any executor or administrator herein named, before the actual payment of the claim as herein provided, then payment of such claim shall be made to the legal representatives of the respective decedents named herein."

Mr. EVANS. I hope that will be adopted unanimously.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I move to amend the amendment by adding:

And if there be none, to their heirs.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That will work the very mischief that we seek to avoid by the amendment—that in all cases where an administrator named in the bill is dead, or in all cases where there has been a discharge, then there would be no administration in existence; and in that case, according to your amendment, the estate would go to the heirs. The whole purpose of the House is to have the money go to the legal representatives.

The effect of my amendment will be to make all of these moneys go through the regular course of administration. The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky would be to pay the money at once to the heirs where the administrator named in the bill is dead or is discharged, thereby defeating the very purpose and the great object which the members desire to promote.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I concede the force of the suggestion, and withdraw the amendment. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I rise to renew that amendment for a moment, and I want to make this suggestion: After a certain time in some States you can not take out letters of administration, these being barred by the statute of limitation.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Then the heirs would have the only legal right.

Mr. MADDOX. Do you think that would be the effect?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Unquestionably. If, under the statutes, we can not have administration after a certain period, then the only legal representative would be the heir; and this amendment provides that in all cases this fund shall go to the legal representative.

Mr. MADDOX. I wanted to understand that proposition, and that is the reason why I renewed the amendment. I now withdraw it.

Mr. COX. I appreciate very fully what the gentleman from Illinois is trying to accomplish, but it seems to me that after the words "legal representatives" he should add the words "as recognized by the States."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is already done in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Did the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] hear the remark of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX]? He said there were certain States in which administration could not be taken out after a certain period of time. If there is any State where such is the law, the only remaining legal representatives would be the heirs. There are but few States in which that situation exists. I do not know of any. I think all the friends of this bill are in favor of this amendment being attached.

The amendment of Mr. CONNOLLY was agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON. I move an amendment to the title, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend the title of the bill by inserting, after the words "Bowman Act," the words "and the act approved March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act."

Mr. DINGLEY. Are there any Tucker Act cases in the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There are two or three claims referred under both acts.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the title ought not to be amended in that way. That would include other cases.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There are none except Bowman Act claims, I think; but there are two or three cases where the words "Tucker Act" were also inserted.

Mr. GIBSON. I withdraw the amendment, and I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4936) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended it do pass.

Mr. GIBSON. I move the previous question upon the bill and amendments to its passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any of the amendments?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; I demand a separate vote upon the amendment on page 71.

The SPEAKER. Is any other separate vote demanded? The Chair hears none.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 71, strike out all of lines 18, 19, and 20, as follows:
"To the heirs of the late Mrs. Mary Ann Randolph Custis Lee, of Fairfax County, $217,336."

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of agreeing to this amendment, which strikes out the section just read, will say "aye."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Virginia), there were—ayes 107, noes 72.

Mr. SWANSON. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I should like unanimous consent to have one minute, in which to make an explanation of the vote I am going to cast.

The SPEAKER. It is rather late to entertain such a request. The Clerk will proceed.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 132, nays 91, answered "present" 7, not voting 125; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas with Mr. BRENNER of Ohio.

Mr. BEACH with Mr. BODINE.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE with Mr. MCCLELLAN.

Mr. HURLEY with Mr. MARSHALL.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa with Mr. SIMS.

Mr. LYBRAND with Mr. LENTZ.

Mr. HITT with Mr. BERRY.

Mr. BROSIUS with Mr. ERMENTROUT.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia with Mr. STRAIT.

Mr. MAHON with Mr. OTEY.

Mr. BENNETT with Mr. GAINES.

For this day:

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania with Mr. BURKE.

Mr. MOODY with Mr. MCALEER.

Mr. MITCHELL with Mr. LEWIS of Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana with Mr. KLEBERG.

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. HINRICHSEN.

Mr. SHOWALTER with Mr. SLAYDEN.

Mr. SHATTUC with Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is announced, I want to state that my colleague, Mr. SIMS, is confined to his bed by sickness; but he has a pair.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Five o'clock having arrived, the House is in recess until 8 o'clock this evening; and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HOPKINS, will act as Speaker.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. HOPKINS as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule under which the House is acting.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put to go into Committee of the Whole, I ask unanimous consent that all bills for the removal of charges of desertion and for the removal of political disabilities be passed over for to-night.

Mr. LACEY. I would ask my friend not to include bills for the removal of political disabilities in his request. We do not want to have any political disabilities now.

Mr. TALBERT. I will confine my request to bills for removal of charges of desertion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that bills for the removal of charges of desertion be passed over to-night. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under clause 2 of Rule XXVI.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. Division, Mr. Speaker!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes none.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. DOLLIVER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar under the rule, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

NATHANIEL HAUGHTON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 983) to grant an increase of pension to Nathaniel Haughton, late colonel Twenty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of Nathaniel Haughton, late colonel of the Twenty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, upon the pension roll at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty;" and in the same line, after the word "roll," insert "and pay him a pension."

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendments ought not to prevail, and I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. WARNER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 983) granting an increase of pension to Nathaniel Haughton, have fully examined the same and the evidence relating thereto, and respectfully report:

This bill as amended proposes to increase from $15 to $30 per month the pension of Nathaniel Haughton, of Toledo, Ohio, who was mustered in as first lieutenant to date June 24, 1861, and as captain July 30, 1862; was wounded at Gettysburg July 1, 1863, and was mustered out as lieutenant-colonel June 18, 1865. He served in the Twenty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

He filed and established a claim for gunshot wound of right arm and was pensioned therefor at $10 per month from date of discharge. (This was one-half total of rank of captain, which he held when wounded.) His pension was reduced to $7.50, three-eighths total, September 4, 1869, increased to $10 from December 6, 1871, and to $15 from September 11, 1895. No claim has ever been made for any other disability than the wound for which he is pensioned, of which the following description was given when he was last examined by a United States examining board at Toledo, Ohio, September 11, 1895:

"Ball entered the outer aspect of the middle third of right humerus, ranged upward and inward, passing back of the humerous, and made exit on back and internal surface of the soft parts of upper arm and superior third of same. The scar at exit is 3 inches above that of entrance and about 2½ inches to left of it. Scars are each about three-fourths of an inch in diameter, a good deal depressed, closely adherent and sensitive, and pull some in the movements of the arm. At insertion of deltoids right arm measures one-half inch less than left one.

"Right hand is smaller than left one, the soft parts being shrunken. Right hand is one-half inch less in circumference than left one. Ring and little fingers are numb, and he has no useful use of them, as they are paralyzed in great degree. Large index finger and thumb are also weakened and their strength is only slight and is growing less. He has not sufficient strength in right hand to hold any object that is at all heavy. Rate on gunshot wound of right arm two-thirds of total for captain."

The evidence filed with your committee shows that the arm is substantially useless; that the soldier is very poor, 65 years of age, with a wife who can do but little, and that they earn a precarious subsistence by fugitive jobs of light work.

Your committee therefore think this an exceptional and meritorious case, and report the bill back with the recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

In line 6 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty;" and in the same line, after the word "roll," insert "and pay him a pension."

Mr. SOUTHARD. I think there are some affidavits.

The CHAIRMAN. The report of the committee has been read.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I would like to have the Clerk read one of the affidavits.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF OHIO, Lucas County, ss:

The undersigned, being first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he has known Col. Nathaniel Haughton, late colonel of the Twenty-fifth Regiment of Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry, since the close of the war of the rebellion, and is well acquainted with his history during that time; that said Colonel Haughton is now about 65 years of age, and is greatly enfeebled thereby, and in addition thereto by a life of excessive hard work; that he is likewise almost if not totally disabled for manual labor by a wound in his right arm, received in the service of his country; that he is utterly without means of support, and can only earn a precarious subsistence for himself and his old wife by fugitive jobs of light work.

I would respectfully urge the immediate action of Congress in this case, as I believe it one deserving of the special action sought therein.

JOHN S. KOUNTZ,
Past Commander in Chief, Grand Army of the Republic.

Sworn to before me and subscribed in my presence this 4th day of March, A. D. 1898.

[SEAL.] JAMES H. EMERY,
Notary Public, Lucas County, Ohio.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, there are other affidavits, but as they are of the same effect, I will not ask that any of the others be read. It is with a good deal of reluctance that I attempt to oppose the report of this committee. I would not do so if I did not feel certain that in their extreme conservatism they have not done justice to one of the most faithful and efficient soldiers and officers that the late war produced. As the report states, Nathaniel Haughton is now drawing a pension of $15 per month for gunshot wound of the right arm. He has other disabilities, some of them, perhaps, incident to old age, some of them doubtless incident to his army service; but under the technical rulings which prevail at the Department none of these disabilities are attributable to his army service.

He is 65 years of age; he has a wife who is about the same age; he is without a dollar in the world to support him or his old wife. As the affidavit appended to the report states, he earns a living by doing manual labor—small jobs here and there, as he can find them. Nathaniel Haughton was not an ordinary soldier; Nathaniel Haughton was not an ordinary man. He responded to the first call for volunteers during the late war, and he continued in the service until the last shot was fired. He was an exceptional soldier and an exceptional officer.

Before I am done I want to read extracts from some letters that were before the committee and doubtless were considered by them. That is why, I say, in the extreme conservatism of this committee, they have doubtless done less than full justice to this extraordinary man. I have a letter here signed by one Cooper, which was written from Chicago, and as this letter was unsolicited, he speaks, as I have no doubt, the truth. He says:

CHICAGO, February 22, 1898.

DEAR SIR: I understand that there is a bill pending in the House of Representatives for a pension in favor of my old friend, Col. N. Haughton, of Toledo, Ohio, formerly the colonel of the Twenty-fifth Ohio.

I served with the Colonel in the same brigade during the latter part of the war of the rebellion, and know his soldierly qualities and how faithful he was to the Government then, and I feel very anxious that now, in his old age, the Government should do something for him in his necessity.

The One hundred and seventh Ohio, which I commanded, was on several expeditions and in several engagements with the Twenty-fifth Ohio, commanded by Colonel Haughton. In four years and a quarter of service I can say truthfully that I never knew a commanding officer of a regiment more zealous, more untiring in the care, comfort, and efficiency of the men of his regiment, and braver in leading them against the enemy than was Colonel Haughton.

When we were on a campaign in the interior of South Carolina, at the close of a long day's march, when his men were exhausted, he would start out with such mounted men as he could rally to reconnoiter the country, see the lay of the land, and be ready for the next day's campaign. I think I may say fairly that no man in the Army, in command of a regiment, ever put in so much hard work, energy, and force in doing everything that lay in his power to put down the rebellion as did Colonel Haughton.

Opposed as I have been for years to the frightful proportions of our pension list, in the case of Colonel Haughton I feel that every sentiment of justice and patriotism warrants the Government of the United States in making some adequate provision for him in his old age, in consideration of his heroic efforts for that Government when it was itself in sore need of just such efforts.

I write this to you because I learn that you are in charge of the bill. A member of Congress from my district, Hon. JAMES A. MANN, is a friend of mine, to whom you are at liberty to show this communication; also Senator WILLIAM E. MASON of this State and to Maj. JAMES A. CONNOLLY, if they are in a position to do any good to the cause.

Very truly, yours,

JNO. S. COOPER.

Hon. J. H. SOUTHARD, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I have here a large number of letters equally commendatory in character. I have letters from those who served with him in his regiment, and from many who were familiar with his career all through the war. As I said, he served a little over or a little less than five years. No officer of his rank has a more brilliant career than he; no officer in the whole Army of his rank did greater service than he for his country. Colonel Haughton, as everybody will say who knows him and knows of him, was as good a man as ever stepped into a uniform, and as brave a man as ever carried or followed the flag. He has an old wife, as I have already stated, about his own age, a wife whose spirit was with him during all the vicissitudes of that five years of warfare in which he was engaged. He has made sacrifices for his country.

I want to mention one or two other things. When he went into the Army he had a prosperous business, which he intrusted to the hands of others. During his absence, because of mismanagement or something of that kind, his business was ruined. When he came back he took up the business anew and prospered for many years, but of recent years misfortune has overtaken him, and to-day he has not a dollar in the world. There is no more deserving soldier or officer than Colonel Haughton. He has made sacrifices for his country such as few men have made.

I believe if you knew him as I know him, and as many others know him, you would have no hesitation in voting to defeat this amendment, and I believe it ought to be done. I do not believe that this great and grateful country desires that a man who has done the service that Colonel Haughton has shall go down through his few remaining years a pensioner upon the bounty of his friends. I think I have stated that he has not a child in the world, or anybody upon whom he can lean for support. He has an old wife leaning upon him for support. I ask that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this bill was referred to a subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Ohio was one, and of which Mr. WARNER of Illinois was chairman. They gave it ample consideration, and the full committee gave it ample consideration. We have doubled this man's pension. This man's claim has been considered at the Pension Bureau recently, and they only gave him $15, and we have doubled it in committee.

We have given him within $6 of the sum he would be entitled to if that arm was absolutely useless. It is not absolutely useless; he can use it a great deal in connection with the other hand. We were extraordinarily liberal, and it was the unanimous report of the committee, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I want to say to this committee that that arm is worse than useless.

Mr. RAY of New York. The evidence does not show it.

Mr. SOUTHARD. He is a man whom I see every day, and while the evidence says that it is practically useless, it is worse than useless. It is of no service to him, but is a source of pain and annoyance to him every day he lives. He would be better off without it; and if this arm were useless, if the finding was that the arm was useless, he would be entitled under existing law to a pension of $36 a month. This allowance of $30 a month is not doing justice to a man who has served his country for five years as Captain Haughton has done.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SOUTHARD) there were—ayes 20, noes 13.

So the amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose another amendment. Whenever we leave in the title a description of the service, the Senate amends by striking out the description. I therefore move to amend the title so that it will read: "A bill to grant an increase of pension to Nathaniel Haughton."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM L. GRIGSBY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 73) granting a pension to William L. Grigsby, of Belvidere, in the county of Thayer, Nebr.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of William L. Grigsby, late a private of Company E, Seventeenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, on the pension roll of the United States at the rate of $36 per month, to be paid as other pensions are paid under the general laws of the United States.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. STURTEVANT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 73 and House bill 2205, granting an increase of pension to William L. Grigsby, have examined the same and the evidence relating thereto, and respectfully report the Senate bill.

This bill proposes to increase from $8 to $36 per month the pension of William L. Grigsby, of Belvidere, Nebr.

The soldier served as a private in Company E, Seventeenth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, from February 28, 1862, to April 15, 1865, when honorably discharged.

He was wounded in the head at Vicksburg, Miss., in June, 1863, and has not been well since. He is now partially paralyzed and is nearly helpless. He is in necessitous circumstances.

Considerable evidence is printed with the Senate report (Report No. 284), and it is not necessary to reprint it here or to print the mass of evidence filed with your committee. It is evident that the soldier has a disability of service origin that entitles him to a pension of $36 per month. Such a wound as he received must have produced the disability, as there is no other cause alleged, and such a result as is shown would naturally follow the injury.

The bill is therefore reported back, with the recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

After the word "States," line 6, insert "and pay him a pension."

Strike out all after the word "month," in line 7.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ENOCH G. ADAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1462) granting an increase of pension to Enoch G. Adams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Enoch G. Adams, late captain of Company D, First Regiment United States Infantry, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. SULLOWAY), as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 1462, have fully considered the same and all the evidence, and respectfully report:

This bill proposes to increase from $24 to $50 per month the pension of Enoch G. Adams, of South Berwick, Me., late Company D, First Regiment United States Infantry. This claimant is in necessitous circumstances, a graduate of Yale College, and served with credit from April 23, 1861, to November, 1865. He enlisted as a private and rose to the rank of captain, and was brevetted major for gallant and meritorious services. He was shot in battle, but did not quit the service until after the war was over. His gunshot wound of the neck was of a serious character and affected the nervous system and brain.

His disabilities on account of same have steadily increased, until now he is totally disabled and requires almost constant aid and attendance. He can move about some, but only with danger to himself, and these disabilities (incurable) are constantly increasing. He is now 68 years of age. In 1883 he was granted a pension of $24 per month by special act of Congress, and as the disabilities have increased to a $50 rate special action is again justified.

The bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, this was first $24, and then it is raised to $50 by this bill, and that is the present proposition.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; he is a helpless man. His disabilities are of service origin, every one of them.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LOVEZILA L. PATTERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3185) granting a pension to Lovezila L. Patterson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place Lovezila L. Patterson on the pension roll, at the rate of $25 a month, as widow of Alexander V. Patterson, late surgeon of the One hundred and second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "place," insert "the name of."

From lines 4 and 5 strike out the following: "on the pension roll, at the rate of $25 a month as."

At the end of line 7 add the following: "on the pension roll, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ANNA M. TATE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 711) granting a pension to Anna M. Tate.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anna M. Tate, dependent mother of Blair Tate, late a private in Company K, Twenty-sixth Iowa Infantry Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

After the word "Volunteers," in line 8, insert "and pay her a pension."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

HIRAM R. RHEA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8770) to repeal chapter 164, laws of 1871, approved March 3, 1871, being an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Hiram R. Rhea."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 164 of the laws of 1871, approved March 3, 1871 (16 United States Statutes at Large), and entitled "An act granting a pension to Hiram R. Rhea," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

CHARLES BECKWITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4449) granting a pension to Charles Beckwith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Charles Beckwith, late of Company A, Seventh Michigan Cavalry, and pay him a pension of $30 a month.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 5 strike out the capital letter "A" and insert in lieu thereof the capital letter "I," so as to correctly describe the service of the soldier.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Charles Beckwith."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

DAVID C. WARING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1855) granting an increase of pension to David C. Waring.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David C. Waring, Company B, Eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and Company I, Twenty-third Regiment, and pay him a pension of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-four."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES F. M'KINLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6793) granting an increase of pension to James F. McKinley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of James F. McKinley, late of Company K, One hundred and ninety-fifth Pennsylvania Infantry, at the rate of $24 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6, after the word "Infantry," insert "and pay him a pension."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

FLORENCE N. WALDRON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5245) granting a pension to Florence N. Waldron, helpless daughter of Capt. Samuel F. Waldron, Company I, Thirty-third Regiment New Jersey Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Florence N. Waldron, helpless daughter of the late Capt. Samuel F. Waldron, Company I, Thirty-third Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $20 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 7, after the word "Infantry," insert "and pay her a pension."

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. BARBER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R.

5245) granting a pension to Florence N. Waldron, have examined the same, all the facts, and the legal questions involved, and respectfully report:

This bill proposes to restore to the rolls and continue at her former rate the pension of claimant, Florence N. Waldron, of Newark, N. J., the crippled and helpless daughter of Samuel F. Waldron, late captain Company I, Thirty-third New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, who served from August 29, 1863, to November 23, 1863, when killed in battle at Chattanooga, Tenn.

The widow was pensioned at $20 from the date of soldier's death until April 4, 1871, and this claimant was pensioned at $23 from that time until September 13, 1876, when she became 16 years of age.

Under the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890, she is entitled to a continuance of her pension if she be "insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless."

She filed a claim under said act October 29, 1895, but it was rejected January 18, 1896, "Permanent helplessness not shown." It was reopened by Commissioner Murphy, but was again rejected May 4, 1896, on the same ground.

This claimant is not "insane" or "idiotic," and the only question is whether she is "otherwise permanently helpless."

It is shown by evidence that when about 5 years of age she fell from a window two and a half stories high into a stone area, which caused an injury from which she has never recovered. She has been compelled to use crutches ever since.

Certificate of medical examination made November 24, 1895, shows "enlargement of left knee, with flexion one-fourth and permanent anchylosis; enlargement and anchylosis probably osseous and fibrous." The left lower extremity is atrophied and is shortened 4 inches.

Claimant is obliged to use crutches in standing and walking. The left leg is permanently useless. No evidence of vicious habits. Functions peculiar to her sex abnormally frequent, occurring every three weeks and draining in character.

Claimant by injury of left knee and anæmia is so disabled as to be in capacitated in a degree equivalent to the loss of a foot for the purposes of manual labor.

Examination of February 20, 1896, shows practically the same condition. It is shown by the testimony of a physician that besides her lameness she suffers terrible pain in her limb, and that as a result of that and her reduced nervous condition she has been subject to convulsions for five or six years.

The question is not so much one of fact as of law, as the facts are admitted. The law, in so many words, states that this pension shall be continued to this child if she be "insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless." The law does not say totally helpless. The intent of the law is to provide a pension to such a child when it is incapable by reason of disabilities arising in early youth of earning its own living—of maintaining itself. The law gives the pension to support the child, in part at least, because it can not support itself. Then any child in such a condition is within not only the intent and meaning of the law, but within its spirit and letter.

Webster thus defines the word "helpless":

"Helpless. (1) Destitute of help; without aid; wanting assistance. (Example.) 'How shall I, then, your helpless fame defend?' (2) Wanting power to succor one's self; weak. (Example.) 'Thou tutelary friend of helpless men.'"

Webster thus defines "helplessness":

"Want of ability; want of succor in one's self; weakness."

This girl can not either stand or walk without the use of crutches. These must be made and brought to her by others. She can not supply herself with the artificial means absolutely necessary to enable her to stand up or move about. Therefore without the aid of others she would remain in one place and starve. Is she not helpless? True she can eat if food is brought her by others and so is not totally and wholly helpless; but she can not procure food or clothing or fire or a home.

Her nervous system is shattered, and she has frequent convulsions and suffers constant pain; therefore, her life is in danger when not attended, watched, and cared for by another. In short, owing to her physical condition (existing since she was 2 years of age), this girl can not maintain her own existence; can not provide herself the necessaries of life, and so this child is really in this regard in a worse condition than many who are insane or idiotic. Many of these unfortunates can do work—earn a living. This girl can use her hands, and (when not in convulsions) can sew or knit or paint, but without artificial aid furnished by another she can not procure the means to do either kind of work.

Your committee is of the opinion that a broad, reasonable, and liberal construction should be given by the Department to the statute referred to—a construction that will render effectual, not thwart, the intent of Congress. The Pension Bureau decided (per Assistant Secretary Reynolds, 8 P. D.) that the term "permanently helpless," in the third section of the act of June 27, 1890, is, in its application to the capacity of a minor to earn a support, relatively of the same meaning as the words "insane" and "idiotic" used in the same clause. Your committee is of the opinion that this is a strained and unwarranted construction, one that defeats in many meritorious and deserving cases the humane purpose of the statute referred to.

The bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

In line 7, after the word "Infantry," insert "and pay her a pension."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, for the reason I have already stated in connection with another bill, I move to amend the title in this case by striking out all after the words "Florence N. Waldron." This amendment leaves out all the descriptive language.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that on the 16th of December, 1897, a bill was introduced by myself on the subject of pensions and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The bill limited the class of persons who should hereafter claim pensions. The matter of appropriations to pay pensions and other debts becomes a serious one. I had thought to-night to make the question of no quorum; but I am assured by gentlemen that the bill to which I have just referred will be considered and reported to this House by next Friday. With this assurance and only for the reason I have stated I shall raise no question of that kind to-night.

The question being taken, the amendment proposed by Mr. RAY of New York was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZABETH ROGERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7783) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Rogers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Elizabeth Rogers, of Lock, Bell County, Ky., widow of David S. Rogers, captain and major, First Tennessee Volunteer Infantry in the Indian wars, from $8 to $30 per month.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 7 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof "twelve."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SUSAN A. HUBER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1897) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan A. Huber, of Louisville, Ky.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll at the rate of $25 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Susan A. Huber, widow of Jeremiah F. Huber, late captain in the United States Army.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "at the rate of $25 per month."

In line 6 strike out "Mrs."

At the end of line 8 add the following: "and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving."

Amend the title so it will read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Susan A. Huber."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES A. FOSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4979) granting a pension to Charles A. Foster, late acting assistant surgeon, United States Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States the name of Charles A. Foster, late acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear the report in that case read.

Mr. RAY of New York. Before that is done, I move to amend the title so that it will read "A bill granting a pension to Charles A. Foster," leaving off the other description, for the reasons already stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. STURTEVANT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4979) granting a pension to Dr. Charles A. Foster, submit the following report:

This bill proposes to pension at $12 per month Charles A. Foster, of Canandaigua, N. Y.

Dr. Charles A. Foster served as acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, from March 9, 1864, to November 30, 1865, and from December 1, 1865, to July 25, 1866, when his service was honorably terminated.

On August 29, 1890, he applied for pension under the act of Congress approved June 27, 1890, and was pensioned thereunder at $12 per month until May 10, 1895, when he was dropped from the rolls, under the decision of the Secretary of the Interior dated November 24, 1893, in the case of Andrew J. Shannon, on the ground that his was not a pensionable service under the act cited, as he was not regularly mustered into the military service of the United States. Up to the date of the decision above cited, such service had been held to be pensionable under the act in question.

On March 3, 1865, contract surgeons were put on the same footing, as to pensions, with assistant surgeons who were regularly mustered into the service. They endured similar hardships and were exposed to the same dangers. This man is now about 80 years of age, in feeble health, and, as it appears from the evidence, in need of the pension.

Your committee believe the case comes within the spirit if not the strict letter of the law under which he was pensioned, which was intended, as they believe, to include all branches of service which were then held to be pensionable under the general pension laws, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, the point I desire to make in this case is that this man was never mustered into the service. I do not propose to make any opposition to the bill, but I call the attention of the chairman to the fact that if the Senate Committee on Pensions adhere to the rule they have laid down, it seems to me useless to send such bills over there, because they say they will not consider them; that they will not consider the claims of persons who were never mustered into the service.

Mr. RAY of New York. No; I beg the pardon of the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, under the law as it is on the statute book, these men were for years held to be pensionable, held to be within the spirit and letter of the law, but later on, in the case cited here, they held that although they were in the service with the Army and endured all the hardships and dangers incident to the service, yet that, not being mustered in, they did not come within the strict letter of the law.

Since that decision was made this House has repeatedly said, and the Senate has repeatedly said, that these men are within the spirit and intent of the law. So these cases are placed within the spirit and intent of the law by these special bills. It is a mere technicality in the construction of the law now on the statute books. It has been thoroughly considered, and the Senate and House are in perfect harmony.

Mr. TALBERT. I did not care to make any captious opposition to the bill. I simply desired to bring out the facts with reference to the matter.

The amendment of Mr. RAY of New York to the title was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARIA E. HESS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 864) granting a pension to Maria E. Hess, widow of Florian Hess.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $12 per month, the name of Maria E. Hess, widow of Florian Hess, who was pensioned under certificate No. 65836 as a private in Capt. J. Rollin's company of Minnesota Volunteers.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "at the rate of $12 per month."

In lines 6, 7, and 8 strike out the words "who was pensioned under certificate No. 65836 as."

Add, at the end of line 9, the following: "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to hear the reading of the report in this case. This is not a remarried widow, is it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk began the reading of the report (by Mr. BOTKIN), which is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 864) granting a pension to Maria E. Hess, have examined the same and the evidence relating thereto and respectfully report:

This bill proposes to pension, at $12 per month, Maria E. Hess, of New Ulm, Minn., the widow of Florian Hess, a private in Capt. J. Belin's company, Eleventh Minnesota Volunteer Militia, who was called into service against the Sioux Indians, and in an engagement at New Ulm, Minn., August 23, 1862, was severely wounded in the left shoulder. He was treated in hospital, from which he appears to have been discharged September 1, 1862.

A ball passed entirely through the neck of the humerus, shattering it badly, so much so that several pieces of bone were removed while in hospital at St. Peters, Minn. A medical certificate, signed by two physicians and dated February 27, 1866, states that he was then incapable of earning a subsistence by manual labor because of a gunshot wound, fracturing the neck of the left humerus and causing comminuted fracture of the bone, requiring excision of part of same, causing the shoulder joint to be entirely useless, together with upper and fore arm.

At an examination in 1875 the examining surgeon said:

"From time to time till now exfoliation takes place, combined with severe pain. His general health is also very poor, his body much emaciated, and he is in fact not able to perform any manual labor."

And the same conditions existed when examined in 1877.

He was pensioned at $6 from discharge and was increased to $8, $14, $24, and $36, which rate he was receiving when he died February 24, 1892.

This claimant was paid the accrued pension due soldier at date of death.

She filed a claim March 29, 1892, under the general law, but it was rejected October 20, 1894, on the ground that death resulted from disease of stomach, which has not been legally accepted.

In an affidavit filed March 29, 1893, J. S. Schock, M. D., said:

"Florian Hess died the 24th day of February, 1892.

"He had suffered for three years with chronic gastritis, which resulted in thickening and contraction of the pyloric end of stomach with ulcers. These ulcers were the direct cause of his death, being the source of the hæmatemesis.

"Have treated the deceased for the past three years, during which time he always had a cachectic anæmic appearance, which he claimed dated from his wound fever at the hospital, and it never left him."

In an affidavit, dated August 14, 1894, the same physician said that while the soldier was a chronic sufferer from chronic gastritis, it was at no time considered serious, for his wounds and suffering therefrom kept him weak and feeble, and had more to do with his death than gastritis. During the last weeks of his suffering his system was unable to sustain the drain of his injuries, and septic fever set in from absorption, which hastened and was the indirect cause of his death, and directly traceable to his wounds.

The claimant was married to the soldier September 30, 1852, and is about 72 years of age, and needy.

Claimant has no title under act of June 27, 1890, as her husband was not regularly enlisted and mustered into the United States service.

There is no substantial doubt that this soldier died from results of wounds received in battle. True, the results of the wound were so complicated with other troubles that we are not absolutely certain. Still, we may be positive in the opinion that the other troubles would not have produced death, might not have existed at all, had not the weakened and debilitated conditions caused by the wound existed.

This widow is clearly entitled to the pension of $12 per month given by this act.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. RAY of New York said: Did the gentleman call for the reading of this?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask him to withdraw that request.

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, if the gentleman will make an explanation.

Mr. RAY of New York. This is not the case of a remarried widow. It is the case of the widow of a soldier who, during the war of the rebellion, enlisted and went out on the Western plains to repel the Indians who attacked the settlers along the border. The husband was wounded and afterwards died, but by reason of some defect in his enlistment and muster they denied a pension to the widow. He was there, he served with a company, he acted as a soldier all through, and this bill is simply to remedy a technicality, and is necessary because of an omission on the part of the officers of the Government in mustering him in.

Mr. TALBERT. He was not regularly mustered in?

Mr. RAY of New York. Not regularly.

Mr. TALBERT. But he was in the service?

Mr. RAY of New York. He was in the service, did the fighting, and was wounded.

The amendment proposed by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SALLIE WORK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2119) to grant a pension to Miss Sallie Work.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Miss Sallie Work, orphan, permanently helpless invalid daughter of James B. Work, late private of Company F, Fifty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and Sarah Work, his wife, now both dead, and grant her a pension of $30 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 6 strike out the word "Miss."

In line 9 strike out the word "grant" and insert in lieu thereof the word "pay."

In lines 9 and 10 strike out the words "of thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the rate of fifteen."

Add at the end of line 10 the following: "and that same be paid to her legal guardian when appointed."

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to have the report in that case read.

Mr. RAY of New York. What information does the gentleman desire?

Mr. TALBERT. Well, I want to know the condition of this girl—whether she comes under the law?

Mr. RAY of New York. She is perfectly helpless, and has been so from her infancy. Now, let me call the gentleman's attention to the law, and the reason why some of these bills come in here. They construe the law at the Pension Office in this way: They say that if a soldier of the Republic had an imbecile or otherwise helpless child, born so, or so from infancy, if that child reaches the age of 16 years before the soldier father dies, it can not draw a pension from that time on at all; but they say that if that child lives and is not 16 until the day after the father dies, then she can draw a pension as long as she lives.

Mr. TALBERT. Does this applicant come under the law?

Mr. RAY of New York. She comes within the spirit and intent of the law, and it is only by reason of an omission on the part of Congress that this special bill is necessary. A general bill has been considered in the committee and reported to the House, after receiving the vote of every Democrat as well as of every Republican on the committee. When that bill becomes a law, special bills of this character will not be necessary.

Mr. STALLINGS. Does not this bill provide for a pension of $15 a month?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes.

Mr. STALLINGS. She would not get $15 under the general law?

Mr. RAY of New York. She would get $12 under the general law; but your committee have arrived at the conclusion that in the case of a permanently helpless child, so born, or in that condition from early infancy, $15 per month is not too great. We have reported several bills at that figure, in such cases, and therefore we put in the amount at $15 in this bill.

Mr. STALLINGS. Has the general bill to which the gentleman referred passed the committee and been reported to the House?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM H. SAVAGE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8515) to increase the pension of William H. Savage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Savage, late captain Company A, Seventeenth Maine Volunteers, and to pay him a pension of $20 per month in lieu of that which he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ISAIAH F. FORCE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 93) granting an increase pension to Isaiah F. Force.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaiah F. Force, late major in the One hundred and fortieth Regiment New York Infantry Volunteers, and that he pay him a pension of $72 per month in lieu of all other pension.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 8 strike out the words "seventy-two" and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty-five."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. JOHN W. HOLT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4148) to pension Mrs. John W. Holt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $12 per month, subject to the provisions and regulations of the general pension laws, the name of Mrs. John W. Holt, of Topeka, Kans., the stepmother of L. B. Holt, who was a private in Company L, Fifteenth Pennsylvania Infantry.

The Committtee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "at the rate of $12 per month."

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the following: "Mrs. John W. Holt," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Elizabeth Holt."

Add at the end of line 9 the following: "And pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

Amend the title so it will read: "A bill granting a pension to Elizabeth Holt."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LOWELL H. HOPKINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 378) granting a pension to Lowell H. Hopkinson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at $50 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lowell H. Hopkinson, late a member of Company A, Fifty-seventh and Fifty-ninth Regiments Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the following: "At $50 per month,"

At the end of line 8 add the following: "And pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving."

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Chairman, let us have the report on that.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 378) granting an increase of pension to Lowell H. Hopkinson, have examined the same and all the evidence relating thereto, and respectfully report:

This bill proposes to increase from $12 to $50 per month the pension of Lowell H. Hopkinson, of Groveland, Mass.

Claimant served in Company H, Eleventh Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, from April 20, 1861, to October 25, 1863, when he was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability for severe wound of right elbow, received at Manassas, Va., August 29, 1862. He served in Company A, Fifty-ninth and Fifty-seventh Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, from November 14, 1863, to July 30, 1865.

Besides the certificate of disability there is record of treatment for chronic diarrhea and pleurisy during last service, contracted while a prisoner of war. (Captured at Cold Harbor, Virginia, June 3, 1864. Paroled December 10, 1864.)

Soldier was pensioned under the general law for disease of kidneys and gunshot wound left arm, and was receiving $5 per month September 17, 1890, when increased to $8 under the act of June 27, 1890. He was again increased under said law from November 12, 1895, to $12, which rate he is now receiving, for "disease of urinary organs, gunshot wound left arm, loss of part of right index finger, lumbago, and paralysis." The last medical examination rates him two-eighteenths for wound of arm, four-eighteenths index finger, seventeen-eighteenths for paralysis and resulting urinary disease, and ten-eighteenths for malarial poisoning. He requires the regular personal aid and attendance of another person.

"Claimant can not rise from his bed without assistance, but by means of a rope attached to a ring over his bed he is able to raise his shoulders while an assistant swings him into a wheel chair, where he sits and moves about the room. No evidence of vicious habits."

The bill calls for $50. If all the disability could be shown to be directly due to service he would be entitled to $72.

Claimant is 61 years of age. Evidence filed with this committee shows that he is in need, and aside from his pension is absolutely dependent on the charity of his friends for his support.

It is impossible to separate the disabilities of the soldier incurred in the service from those arising since. Indeed, it is not at all improbable that the entire disability from which the soldier now suffers is of service origin or resultant from those clearly traceable to his army service.

In any event he is in such a physical and financial condition that special legislation is demanded and fully warranted.

The bill is therefore reported back with the recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the following: "At $50 per month."

At the end of line 8 add the following: "And pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CALVIN C. LYNN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3953) granting a pension to Calvin C. Lynn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Calvin P. Lynn, late a member of Company G, One hundred and fortieth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, on the pension roll at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 6, after the word "roll," insert the following: "and pay him a pension."

In line 7 strike out "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Calvin P. Lynn."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN X. GRIFFITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8636) granting a pension to John X. Griffith, late of Company A, Seventy-seventh Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John X. Griffith, late of Company A, Seventy-seventh Illinois Volunteer Infantry, from his present rate to $72 a month.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out the words "increase the pension" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "place on the pension roll the name."

In line 6 strike out the words "from his present rate to seventy-two" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and pay him a pension of fifty."

At the end of line 7 add the following: "in lieu of the pension he is now receiving."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPH MONTIETH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2253) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Montieth.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Montieth, late a private of Company G, Third Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Mr. DAYTON. I hope the Chair will give me an opportunity to explain the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, just here, if I may be permitted, before the House went into Committee of the Whole this evening I asked unanimous consent that all cases for the removal of charges of desertion be passed over to-night, and that order was made by the House. It can not, as I understand it, be vacated by the Committee of the Whole, but as my friends have come to me and appealed to me personally, and have called my attention to three or four of these cases, I have reached the conclusion that they are meritorious——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order raised by the gentleman is well taken.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not make the point of order, but simply say to these gentlemen that after we go back into the House I shall make no objection if they then ask unanimous consent to vacate that order.

Mr. RAY of New York. After we have passed the pension bills, if there is time left, these bills can be taken up.

Mr. TALBERT. That is what I suggest.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to inform the committee that the pension bills have all been disposed of.

And then, on motion of Mr. RAY of New York, the committee rose; and Mr. HOPKINS having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. EVANS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, reported that that committee had had under consideration certain Senate and House bills, and had directed him to report them back, some with and some without amendments, and with a favorable recommendation; also, that they had instructed him to report back the bill (H. R. 5963) with the recommendation that the bill do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill.

WHELOCK G. VEAZEY.

The first business was the bill (H. R. 5963) granting a pension to Whelock G. Veazey.

Mr. RAY of New York. I move that that bill do lie upon the table, for the reason that Colonel Veazey is dead.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY C. CASE.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 2762) granting a pension to Mary C. Case, of Holdrege, Phelps County, Nebr.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend that bill by striking out "seventeen" and inserting "twenty-five." By an error in a pencil memorandum on that bill the amount "seventeen" was put in when it should have been "twenty-five," as the committee reported it. I have the record of the committee here, and I make that motion so as to carry out the wishes of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the question will be put on the committee amendment, and the object of the gentleman from New York can be reached by voting down the amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventeen."

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask that that be voted down.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAY of New York. The bill reads "twenty-five."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the second amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, after the word "month," strike out the words "from March, 1897."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RAY of New York. I move to reconsider the votes by which the several bills have been passed, and also move to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. SHERRARD.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8614) to correct the naval record of George W. Sherrard.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the naval record of George W. Sherrard, late an enlisted first-class boy, who served on U. S. S. Princeton, Daylight, and Shenandoah, was transferred to the Princeton, and marked on the rolls of said vessel as having "never reported," and grant him a discharge: Provided, That said Sherrard shall not by the passage of this act be entitled to any bounty or back pay of any kind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DAYTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. HUGO.

Mr. JETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1032) for the relief of William H. Hugo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the laws regulating appointments in the Army of the United States be, and they are hereby, suspended for the purposes of this bill, and that, in view of his services to his country, the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint William H. Hugo, now of Fort Bayard, N. Mex., a first lieutenant of cavalry in the Army of the United States, and thereupon to place him on the retired list of the Army with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer with the rank of a first lieutenant, without regard and in addition to the retired list now authorized by law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RIDGELY. I would like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. BISHOP. I object.

JOHN WELTY.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4650) for the relief of John Welty, of Portsmouth, Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to so amend and correct the military record of John Welty, of Portsmouth, Scioto County, Ohio, late a private soldier in Company B, Fifty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, as to remove the charges of desertion and to show that said Welty was captured by the enemy on June 25, 1862, and paroled on June 28, 1862, and permitted by Major-General Grant, commanding the district, to pass from Memphis, Tenn., to his home in Ohio, to remain until notified of his exchange or otherwise ordered; and duly exchanged by General Orders No. 10, War Department, January 10, 1863, and ordered to return to his command; and absent without leave until March 5, 1863, when he enlisted in the Navy of the United States for two years, served faithfully, and was honorably discharged at the expiration of his service: Provided, That no pay or allowances shall become due by reason of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

N. WARD CADY.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6098) to correct the military record of N. Ward Cady, late major, Second Mounted Rifles, New York Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to set aside the findings of the court-martial in the case of N. Ward Cady, late major, Second Mounted Rifles, New York Volunteers, and to grant to said N. Ward Cady an honorable discharge from said company and regiment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Provided, That no pay or allowances shall become due by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 10.30 having arrived, in accordance with the rules, the House stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive and other communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

ANNEXATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I have here an argument of the late Judge John D. Caton, one of the most prominent jurists of Illinois, now dead, written to the late Secretary of State, Mr. Gresham, in relation to the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. It is a very valuable paper, found amongst the papers of the deceased judge. I move that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3111) granting a pension to Cornelia M. Mason, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McENERY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 763) for the relief of Augustus G. Kellogg, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2219) for the relief of the administrators of Isaac P. Tice, deceased, and others, to report it without amendment, and to submit a report thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the bill (S. 466) for the relief of the administrators of Isaac P. Tice, deceased, and others, being Order of Business 153 on the Calendar, be indefinitely postponed, and that the House bill just reported by me be given the place of the Senate bill on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LINDSAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1472) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Bettie Hord Brown, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1000) for the relief of Stephen Duncan Marshall and George M. Miller, executors of the will of Levin R. Marshall, deceased, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANNA, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 140) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Law, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 28th instant relative to the use of pneumatic tubes in the mail service, intended to be proposed to the Post-Office appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8428) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, to report it with various amendments. I also submit a report to accompany the bill.

I give notice at this time that I shall be glad to call up the bill to-morrow morning in the Senate for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. DAVIS. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to request that that committee have leave to sit from day to day during the sessions of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota make a motion to that effect?

Mr. DAVIS. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has heard the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That the Committee on Foreign Relations have leave to sit from day to day during the sessions of the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR CORRESPONDENCE ON AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

Mr. FRYE. I report a resolution from the Committee on Foreign Relations. It may be allowed to lie on the table until to-morrow morning, when I shall ask for its consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the President by requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate all of the consular correspondence relating to the conduct of the war in the Island of Cuba, the condition of the people, and other matters relating thereto.

Mr. FRYE. Let the resolution lie on the table, and I shall ask for its consideration to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

ERECTION OF TEMPORARY FORTIFICATIONS IN STATES.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 129) relative to suspension of part of section 355 of Revised Statutes, relative to erection of forts, fortifications, etc., to report it without amendment, and to ask for the immediate consideration of the same.

I beg leave to submit a word of explanation. This is the joint resolution introduced on Monday by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] relating to a suspension of certain provisions of the statute which make it impossible to proceed with certain fortifications because the consent of the legislature is required before the purchase of land from a private citizen takes effect. The joint resolution proposes, in short, to make the lease or anything else of the land sufficient to waive the approval of the legislature and the examination of the title by the Attorney-General. There are several places on the coast where not only no one objects to the erection of such fortifications, but, indeed, they are ardently desired, and by none more than by the people of the States, of course, but this technicality stands in the way. The committee sees no objection to waiving it in these cases. I ask that the joint resolution may be read and considered.

Mr. PASCO. I hope it will be read for information before consent is asked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator could be content to make his argument now. This is one of those questions that ought not to go over if it be possible to pass the bill.

Mr. PASCO. A single day's delay will make but little difference, and I prefer that it shall go over, so that I may look at it before it is considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 4294) granting a pension to John Stauffer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4295) to correct the naval record of Charles Ferkler; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 4296) to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted rangers in the interest of the public safety; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WELLINGTON introduced a bill (S. 4297) for the relief of Mary K. Lewis, administratrix of Joseph C. Lewis, deceased, late of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 4298) granting an increase of pension to Edward R. Young; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 136) authorizing the Secretary of War to exchange a battery and equipments with the governor of the State of Wyoming; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FAIRBANKS submitted an amendment relative to the claim of John Brady, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WELLINGTON submitted an amendment relative to the claim of Charles Stewart, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MASON submitted an amendment relative to experimental tests of an underground electric conveyer for the distribution of mail matter, intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment relative to the purchase by the Secretary of the Interior from Albert Douglas, administrator of the estate of Samuel Kendrick, deceased, certain original records, etc., pertaining to lands and locations within the Virginia military districts of Kentucky and Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment relative to the purchase from the Union Benevolent Association of the District of Columbia of a tract of land on the southern side of the Zoological Park, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, it was Ordered, That all the papers relating to S. 2225, granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Rand, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from the files of the Senate and sent to the custody of Senator PROCTOR, there being no adverse report thereon.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR GEORGE.

Mr. WALTHALL. I desire to give notice that on Thursday of next week, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, I shall ask the Senate to lay aside its ordinary business to afford an opportunity to pay tribute to the memory of my late colleague, Senator GEORGE.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, on the 10th of March last, by direction of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I addressed a communication, officially, on behalf of the committee, to the Secretary of the Treasury, asking him for his views on the general subject of postal savings banks. The committee had received a lengthy, courteous, and enlightening answer from the Postmaster-General, and it was deemed of the utmost importance that we should ascertain from the Secretary of the Treasury his views respecting the general character of bills establishing post-office savings banks, which had been asked for by several millions of the people of the United States. We desired his views as to the character of investments, the proper procedure, the question of agencies, and other important matters connected with the subject.

After waiting some time the committee received, through me as chairman, a reply from the Secretary of the Treasury. I have to report to the Senate that the answer from the Secretary of the Treasury was of such a character that I have been unanimously directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to respectfully return the communication to the Secretary of the Treasury with the statement that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads must decline to receive it, as it is not a response to the letter of the committee.

Mr. President, the letter was published in the press of the country, given out through the Treasury Department, before the answer was received by us, before it was laid upon my desk, and therefore, inasmuch as there has been already publicity given to this subject, I shall ask to publish as a Senate document the letter of the committee to the Secretary of the Treasury, the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the letter which I have this day, by unanimous instruction of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The whole circumstances, Mr. President, are remarkable. I do not care at this time to go beyond the instructions which my committee have given me. I do not intend to enter upon the personal consideration of this question, but I have only to say to the Senate that an inspection of these documents will satisfy the Senate that officially, at least, the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury is flippant and impertinent, and that it has no place upon the records of the important committees of this body.

I beg to send the letters to the desk, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD and as a Senate document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

MARCH 10, 1898.

DEAR SIR: I beg to inclose herewith copies of bills which have been referred to this committee upon the subject of postal savings banks. The committee will appreciate it if you will, at your earliest convenience, give them your ideas respecting the bills and any suggestions which you may have to make upon the general subject of postal savings banks.

Respectfully,

E. O. WOLCOTT, Chairman.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your communication of the 10th instant, inclosing copies of bills upon the subject of postal savings banks, and suggesting that I give you my ideas respecting the bills, and any suggestions which I may have to make upon the general subject of postal savings banks. The subject is a most important one, involving very grave considerations as to the proper functions of government, its ability to manage, through existing agencies or others that might be created, a great fiduciary trust of the kind contemplated.

On the other hand can be urged the interests of the great body of people whose welfare might be deeply promoted through a postal savings bank system, if such a system should be inaugurated. It is not my purpose to enter into a debate on either side of the question. It has no doubt had a full presentation from both sides in your committee, and if the bill is reported to Congress it will there receive exhaustive consideration.

In view of the fact that such a measure is recommended by the Postmaster-General I have had naturally a sense of delicacy in traversing ground which he has already covered or criticising measures which he has officially recommended.

Learning, however, of your action in submitting these proposed measures to my consideration he has urged me to speak with frankness in response to your communication.

In looking over the various bills as carefully as I could under many interruptions from other official duties, it appears to me that if any bill were to be recommended, bill 2369, with such amendments as have been proposed by the Postmaster-General himself, is fairly adequate to meet the purposes it is sought to cover. The only suggestion I have to make in the way of amendment would be to strike out the first seven lines in section 14, on page 9 of S. 2369.

In offering some general reflections upon the subject, which I avail myself of your liberty to do, the suggestions I make are to be construed as relating to the proper time for authorizing the creation of a postal savings system, and not as any opposition to the proposition itself. Whatever may be the determination of the merits of the question, action looking to establishment of the system should be delayed until certain contemporaneous or previous questions shall be settled.

The first of these in importance is the money standard which is to measure in the future the value of the fund to the depositors. In undertaking a great fiduciary trust like the one proposed a great and powerful nation will enter into contract relations with many thousands of the most humble units composing, in part, the national life. The whole proposition rests upon the theory that these persons would find in the arrangement proposed a guardian whose justice and fidelity could not be questioned, and thus their savings, the fruits of self-denial and industry, be kept effective for their future needs.

In dealing with the young, the unskilled, the dependent, the strong and powerful entering into contract relations with such are under the highest obligations to make the contract so plain that the simplest can understand it, and yet I discover nowhere in any of these bills any agreement or pledge as to the form of money in which depositors are to be paid. This would not be a necessity if, in the body of the general laws, or through long and settled usage, having substantially the force of law, this question was universally understood; but, manifestly, this is not the present situation.

If one of the humble parties to the proposed contract should ask the postmaster agent to whom he should hand his accumulated earnings, now as good as gold: "Will my money, when I draw it out, be in gold or in its fair equivalent?" what answer will you authorize your agent to make? At present he can make no specific answer. He can point to the current fact that the Government is now paying gold or its equivalent. He can point out clauses in certain acts of Congress which declare the policy of the Government to be the maintenance of a parity between silver and gold.

In short, he can show that if these acts remain unrepealed, and if the discretionary power accorded to the President and Secretary of the Treasury under the laws is exercised in one direction, they will be paid in as good money as they part with. But if, on the contrary, this discretionary power be exercised in a contrary direction, they may be paid in a money of a much lower commercial value.

I respectfully submit that such ambiguity, attended with unforeseen contingencies in government administration, does not form a safe or proper basis for the contract relation contemplated. When this element of uncertainty shall be removed, when the standard of payment can be clearly defined and permanently settled—whether that standard be gold or silver—then the savings of the humble classes may be, with their consent, taken over by the Government on terms clearly and plainly stated. In my opinion it can not, with proper regard to national dignity and a due regard to the trustful public, be done before.

Second. It is best to avoid, if possible, the imposition upon officers of the Government, whose tenure of office is brief, duties so delicate as the investment of large sums of money in either municipal, corporate, or landed securities. If the accumulated deposits which would no doubt result from the enactment of the law in question could be invested in United States bonds, the matter would be much simplified. At the present time, however, the outstanding public debt is not under our control, and no public necessity now appears for increasing that debt.

Third. A postal savings-bank system, if adopted, ought to be concurrent with, or closely follow after, a general reform in our banking and currency system. The two ideas should have wise reference to each other. A banking and currency bill has been prepared by a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives.

Without here offering any argument for or against that bill, I note the fact that under it the way could be easily opened to bring under the control of the public Treasury for payment and cancellation a large amount of the United States bonds now held by the national banks, and thus a means provided for at least a partial absorption of the postal savings fund.

I note further that in five years after January next one hundred millions of outstanding bonds will mature and become payable, and that three years afterwards some six hundred millions more will also thus mature. With our banking and currency system established on more scientific foundations; with our money standard taken out of the field of political debate, with its accompanying uncertainties; with a postal-savings act set in operation in timely reference to controlling the fund so as to retire a part or all of the present public debt, the experiment of postal savings banks could be inaugurated under conditions favorable to the best results for all concerned.

Believing, as I do, that the general proposition is strongly supported by public opinion which will meet with final recognition in Congress, I yet believe it to be for the interest of the measure that it be held in abeyance until a more seasonable period for its inauguration.

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Hon. E. O. WOLCOTT,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON POST-OFFICES AND POST-ROADS,
Washington, D. C., March 30, 1898.

SIR: Your communication of the 23d instant, addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, was duly received.

At a meeting of the committee held this morning, at which there was a full attendance, the committee unanimously directed me to return the communication to you and to say that it must decline to receive the letter, and that the committee deems it to be not responsive to my letter, as chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to you of March 10, 1898, to which it purports to be an answer.

The attention of the committee was also called to the fact that your letter was communicated to the public press and published before it had been received by the committee.

Respectfully,

EDWD. O. WOLCOTT,
Chairman

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3720) authorizing cities and towns in the Indian Territory to secure, by condemnation or otherwise, lands necessary for public improvements. The bill will take but a moment, I think. It has the unanimous support of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] introduced yesterday a joint resolution, which is Order of Business 8 on the table. I ask the Senator whether he has any objection to referring the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the committee is now considering the subject-matter?

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection to the joint resolution going to the Committee on Foreign Relations, hoping and expecting that prompt action will be taken on the part of that committee.

The joint resolution (S. R. 132) recognizing the political independence of the Republic of Cuba, and for other purposes, was read the second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RED RIVER BRIDGE AT SHREVEPORT, LA.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6906) to authorize the Shreveport Bridge and Terminal Company to construct and maintain a bridge across Red River, in the State of Louisiana, at or near Shreveport.

Mr. HALE. After the disposition of this bill I shall ask unanimous consent that the Calendar be proceeded with in order, under the five-minute rule, for unobjected cases. That will give everyone the opportunity of having bills considered as they come up in order. I shall not interfere now. I shall not object to this bill; but after it is disposed of I shall ask the Chair to recognize me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Louisiana?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER rose.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Montana can get up his Alaska bill, which is partly finished, I shall not urge my proposition for the Calendar. I hope he will ask unanimous consent to go on with that bill.

Mr. CARTER. In view of the kind suggestion of the Senator from Maine, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3729) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska. The consideration of the bill has been completed except as to one pending amendment, which can, I think, be promptly disposed of.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], which proposes to provide a license system for the District of Alaska. If there be no suggestions or debate on the subject, the question may be now put.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Montana if he does not understand that the pending question is upon a substitute which I offered for a part of the amendment proposed by the Senator from California?

Mr. CARTER. I stand corrected by the Senator from North Dakota. The question before the Senate is on the substitute presented by the Senator from North Dakota for a certain portion of the amendment submitted by the Senator from California.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] submitted an amendment, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] submitted an amendment to that amendment, or a substitute for a portion of it. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the exact character of the amendments might be stated. We have them not on our desks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I was about to state the character of the amendments, if the Chair will permit me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota will proceed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The amendment of the Senator from California provides for a license upon nearly all classes of business in the District of Alaska. It provides for a license on abstract offices, banks, brokers, billiard rooms, bowling alleys, breweries, etc., including all mercantile and professional pursuits. The particular part of the amendment of the Senator from California to which I object is that portion which provides for a license upon the privilege of selling liquor in the District of Alaska.

I have offered an amendment to that portion of the amendment proposed by the Senator from California which prohibits the sale, manufacture, or other dispensing of liquor to the inhabitants or residents and citizens of Alaska. I believe it is the duty of Congress at this time to take charge of this question. I believe that the people in Alaska should be protected against themselves. A high-license law is simply a certificate of partnership between the Government and the saloon keepers. I do not believe that the people of this country desire that the Government of the United States shall engage in such an enterprise.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, while the amendment proposed by the Senator from California was not formally passed upon by the committee, the committee has no objection to urge against its adoption. Indeed, I believe the sense of the committee, if the committee had been convened and its judgment ascertained, would have favored the amendment.

The sale, manufacture, and introduction of intoxicating liquors into the District of Alaska was prohibited many years ago, and it is the concurrent testimony of all persons familiar with the facts, by experience or observation, that the liquor traffic is now and has been continuously carried on there in open defiance of the law. It is true that now and then a small consignment of alcohol or whisky or some decoction of an intoxicating nature is confiscated by the collectors or deputy collectors of customs within the District of Alaska, or at the ports from whence the shipments are made, but it is nevertheless a notorious fact that in the city of Juneau, a city in Alaska which is reached by all the boats plying in the waters between Seattle, Victoria, and the Lynn Canal, there are over forty saloons in actual operation doing business to-day.

A strange fact is presented in connection with the attitude of the Government. While one section of the public law prohibits the introduction of intoxicants into that District or the sale thereof to any person or persons, ever since the first saloon was opened in the District of Alaska the internal-revenue tax has been steadily collected by the Government; and while the traffic is unlawful according to one section of the statute, the man engaged in the traffic has in his place of business prominently displayed in each and every instance the license of the Internal-Revenue Department or the receipt indicating that the Internal-Revenue Department had collected the tax.

The question for consideration here is not of a sentimental character, but of a practical character. Over twenty years of experience has demonstrated the total inability of the Government to enforce a prohibitory law in that District. The nature of the climate, the character of the enterprises being prosecuted there, seem to prohibit in that particular section of our public domain a fair trial of the prohibition scheme. It is alleged by many that alcoholic stimulants are an absolute necessity in the cold region known as the Yukon country, and that alcohol is the only liquid that will not freeze solid there, even in the houses, in the winter.

Since the sale of intoxicating liquor will probably lead to many of the acts of violence and disorder which the officers of the law will be called upon to contend with, it seems all in all more appropriate that we should regulate by law that which we can not prevent by law, and inasmuch as the saloon and its environments may be responsible for much of the disorder we shall be called upon to suppress, it is but the part of wisdom that we should make that class of institutions pay a portion of the expense of control.

It is true that the aborigines, the Indians of that country, are scattered about from the coast to the Frozen Ocean and that the miners going into the country will necessarily commingle with these nomadic bands of Indians. If, by order of court first had and obtained, the name of the individual authorized to sell the intoxicating liquors becomes a matter of record, I assume as a fact that the persons paying the license will have a certain feeling of responsibility to the officers of the law and they will have a powerful incentive to aid in detecting those who are engaged in the traffic in an illegal or illicit manner.

Through this amendment the laws prohibiting the sale or the giving away of intoxicating liquors to Indians are made specially applicable to the District of Alaska; and we think that the laws can be better enforced in that behalf if the names of the persons engaged in the liquor traffic become known to the officers of the law.

I am inclined to the opinion that from this license source alone the Government will collect under the proposed amendment an amount of revenue entirely adequate to discharge all the expenses and obligations of the Government the bill contemplates for the District. I think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, when this subject-matter was under discussion a few days since I took occasion to say that I offered this amendment in the interest of temperance, in the interest of good morals, in the interest of good citizenship and good government. For thirty years the United States has had control over the Territory and District of Alaska. For thirty years there has been a law on our statute books that prohibits the importation of any spirituous liquors into the Territory of Alaska except for medicinal purposes. For thirty years this law has been wantonly violated, and to-day there is not a town, a mining camp, or a shipping port in the District of Alaska where the saloons are not run in full blast to such an extent as would put to shame some of the mining counties of Arizona and New Mexico.

The testimony of every governor who has been appointed in Alaska, of every collector of customs, of every United States marshal, and other Government official—and their testimony has been corroborated by the missionaries in that Territory, by merchants, by shipowners, and others—is that the only way to make Alaska a temperance Territory in reality—to-day theoretically it is so, but practically, as I have stated, the saloons are everywhere—is to control the saloons, and the only way to control the sale of liquor in that or any other place is by a high license, for everyone who purchases a license to vend liquors will then become an officer of the law to see that others who do not pay for this privilege shall not violate the law.

I have before me, and shall ask to have read, the report of the last governor, Governor Sheakley, made in 1896, upon this subject-matter, and also the report of the special inspector of salmon, who was directed by the Secretary of the Treasury to specially examine into this question and to give the Government the result of his observations and his conclusions as to the remedy.

I have before me, upon my desk, a letter from the present governor of Alaska, Governor Brady, who was a missionary for fifteen years in Alaska, and who states that the only way to control the illicit traffic in liquor is by high license and a proper restriction upon its sale.

The result is now that our Government is offering a premium for smuggling liquor into the Territory. On every ship that leaves from any port of the United States, in Washington, Oregon, or California, the coal passers, the firemen, the sailors, and the passengers are endeavoring to conceal spirituous liquors in some part of the cargo or in some of the secret recesses of the vessel. The consequence is that the owners are on the qui vive, constantly watching, for the ship is liable, if the offense is committed with their sanction or permission, to confiscation or to a large fine. So spirituous liquor is constantly being smuggled into Alaska.

An instance came under my observation a few months since where a vessel was wrecked between San Francisco and Port Townsend. She was recovered later, and in her cargo were some 75 or 100 barrels of sugar, and in each of 55 of those barrels there was a keg of whisky covered by sugar. The sugar had melted, but the whisky was there, and would have been smuggled into Alaska had the ship not been wrecked.

Further than that, however, the Canadian and British Columbia merchants are constantly shipping liquor into that Territory—not to the subports of entry, but to some of the many hundreds of islands bordering on the shores of Alaska, where it is cached, as the Canadian French term is for burying articles in the sand or in the earth. Then the boats from the ships go to these islands and carry the liquor into the market, where it is sold and vended out to the people who want to satiate their tastes for such drinks without any control. Minors, boys, and Indians are permitted to indulge in intoxicating liquors there because it is absolutely impossible to control the traffic.

As I said a few days since while discussing this question, Assistant Secretary Hamlin, when he visited Juneau, found twenty-eight saloons in full blast. He gave instructions to close them. The collector of customs said, "That is impossible, unless you send a corps of marines on shore to guard and protect the citizens, for people will break into the saloons." The consequence was that this high official of our Government came away, leaving those saloons engaged in this illicit traffic.

The argument made by my friend from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] that this Government is a party to the sale may be true; but if it is true in Alaska, that is not the place to commence the remedy. The Government to-day is granting an internal-revenue license to people engaged in selling liquor in Alaska, and that is one of the reasons why no jury has yet been found to convict those who violate the law. The liquor dealers say, "The Government has given us a license to sell intoxicating liquors, and therefore we claim that we have a right to sell under that license." There are breweries running in Juneau. The brewers buy their internal-revenue stamps and place them upon the kegs of beer which have been brewed from corn and barley and rye. Molasses is even sent up there and distilled into New England rum, and no internal-revenue tax is paid upon it. Our Canadian friends pay no internal-revenue tax, but they send liquor to those islands, where it is smuggled in without the knowledge of our Government officials.

My friend may say, "But you can control those ports." There are, however, 18,000 miles of coast line in Alaska; there are 580,000 square miles in that Territory; and following the meanderings of the coast line, its sinuosities up through the fiords and around the bays, I believe the coast line will amount to nearly 25,000 miles, or more than the circumference of this whole globe. It is impossible, therefore, to prevent smuggling when the Government offers a premium for smuggling, as it does in this case, because, while the Government theoretically prohibits the importation of liquors into the Territory, it sells to A, B, and C licenses to vend the liquor after it gets there.

If the Government wants to commence reform such as my friend from North Dakota advocates, here is the place to commence, in this capital city, in this District, nearly 10 miles square. The Government not only sells in this District an internal-revenue license, but it takes half of the city license which the saloon men pay for vending their wares. Here is the place for my friend to commence his reform. If my friend means what he says, if he wants this to be a prohibition city, let us commence at the national capital and bring the whole arm of the Government here in making it in fact what he wants to make it in theory.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. What does the Senator mean by saying that the Government takes half of the saloon license in the city of Washington?

Mr. PERKINS. I mean to say that in every appropriation made for the government of this city the Government of the United States pays one-half of the expense, and it is therefore to be assumed that it participates in one-half of the revenues.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that point the Senator is certainly mistaken. His first statement, that the Government of the United States pays one-half of the expenses of this District, is true, but that the Government takes one-half of the proceeds from saloon licenses for its own use I think can not be substantiated.

Mr. PERKINS. Does it not go for the support of the District when it is received?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is very true, but that is a matter with which the District itself has to do. The District grants the licenses and uses the proceeds of them to pay one-half of its contribution.

Mr. PERKINS. I claim that it is part of the revenue of this District.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but not of the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. As much so as the appropriations we make in the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

But my friend from New Hampshire will not deny that every saloon keeper in this city has posted under cover, under glass, as the law requires him to have, a license for the sale of liquor. I do not propose to be placed in the position of advocating intemperance. I believe in temperance. I believe men should be temperate in their habits, in their food, in their drink, in their language, and I believe the way to make people temperate in Alaska is to control that traffic, which we have not done in the past thirty years.

I ask at this point that the Secretary may read the extract which I have marked from the report of Governor Sheakley, of Alaska, bearing upon this subject-matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the extract referred to by the Senator from California.

The Secretary read as follows:

The collector of customs and his deputies and assistants do all they can to prevent this illegal traffic, as is evidenced by the amount of liquor which has been seized during the past year. But his force is wholly inadequate to cover the ground and he is practically without transportation facilities. Once landed, the liquor is hidden in some secure place, to be taken therefrom and disposed of to the retailer as necessity requires. And the retailer also has his private hiding place, and seldom has more than a bottle or so of liquor in his saloon at one time, so if he is raided his loss amounts to practically nothing.

For many years the grand juries here refused to indict saloon keepers or even to allow evidence to be presented of violations of the prohibitory law. This, however, only applied to sales to white men. The grand juries of Alaska have never failed to indict nor petit juries to convict anyone proven guilty of selling whisky to Indians or of selling intoxicating liquor without first having paid the United States internal-revenue tax.

The people of this District take the stand that Congress in passing this prohibitory law had in mind the Indians, understood their condition, and knew that it was necessary for their well-being to keep liquor from them; that when it was passed the white population in Alaska was small and not taken into consideration; that since its passage the white population has largely increased and new conditions arisen, and that in vigorously enforcing the liquor law in regard to the Indians and practically ignoring it in regard to the whites, they are carrying out the spirit of the law and fulfilling the intent of its makers. The civil officials, however, must take the law as they find it, and have strenuously endeavored to enforce it. Their efforts have been practically fruitless, as is shown in previous reports.

At the last November term of our district court, the grand jury indicted all the saloon keepers in the District. They thought it better to plead guilty than to employ attorneys and fight the indictments in court. They plead guilty and each of them was fined $50.

At the last March term of the district court, the grand jury again brought in indictments against all the saloon keepers in the District. Thereupon one of their number entered a plea of guilty, and the court imposed a fine of $500 upon him. The rest immediately combined together, employed many of the attorneys in the District, and prepared to fight the indictments. Demurrers were interposed, but after argument they were overruled by the court, and the indictments held good. United States District Attorney Bennett thereupon moved one of his best cases for trial and presented his evidence, and the case was submitted to the jury, which promptly returned a verdict of not guilty. The district attorney moved another case and again presented the evidence. The defense, as before, offered no evidence at all. This time the jury failed to agree. In each of the cases several days were consumed in securing a jury, and it was with difficulty that in the second case one was secured at all.

The district attorney, feeling that it would be impossible to secure another jury at this term of court, to say nothing about securing a conviction at this time or the expense that would be incurred in proceeding further, and evidently thinking it best to rest on a disagreement rather than absolute acquittals, asked the court to continue the remaining cases over to the coming fall term of court and that each defendant be placed under $500 bonds. This was accordingly done. Indictments are now pending against forty-five saloon keepers, located at Juneau City, Douglas Island, Sitka, and Fort Wrangel. That all of these defendants have sold liquor in violation of the existing prohibitory law is a matter of common notoriety. That one of them will be convicted by a trial jury is, I am sorry to say, not believed for a moment by any resident of Alaska.

The present district attorney has shown commendable zeal in his endeavors to enforce the law, believing that all laws should be enforced until repealed.

It must not be inferred from the way juries stand in regard to this class of cases that Alaska is in any sense of the word a lawless community. The courts here stand as high and are as able as in any part of the United States and crime is as surely punished here as elsewhere. Our juries are not composed of saloon keepers, but of miners and business men. The miner can always be relied upon to mete out equal and exact justice to all. Hard working, large hearted, and just, it is a libel of the basest kind to call him lawless or the community in which he lives a lawless one, and I am glad to bear witness that it is only malicious and irresponsible persons who do so.

As the matter now stands, as I said in my last annual report, this prohibitory liquor law is most demoralizing in its effects. It begets a disregard for all law, fosters smuggling, and causes a large class of citizens, who ought to aid the civil authorities, to be against them, and crimes that ought to be punished and would be, were it not for this law, go unpunished. Being against the Government in this matter they are almost unknowingly against it in others; and a desire to get even often outweighs all other considerations. Meanwhile the sale of liquor goes on openly, and none of the people in the District seem to be opposed to it.

Prohibition, unless supported by a large body of the citizens of a community, means here, as it means everywhere else, "free whisky." Laws to be enforced must be just and reasonable, and must have the support of the people, and even though, as in this District of Alaska, they have no say in their making, in the end they have all to say, when they as jurors in the jury box are called upon to pass upon its violators. The present law should be repealed and in its place a high-license law, with proper safeguards, be enacted. The good effects would be immediately apparent. The saloons would decrease, smuggling would cease, sales of liquor to Indians would be lessened (for every saloon and liquor man would be with the Government to suppress it), vile compounds and death-dealing mixtures would necessarily disappear, and the General Government would be benefited by collecting its proper revenue, which is now lost.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been so much engaged with other matters in connection with other committees that I confess not to a very clear comprehension of the provisions of this proposed license law for the District of Alaska. I will first ask the Senator from California who has offered the amendment what amount of license is to be required of the wholesale and retail dealers under the terms of his amendment?

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator will allow me, I have some other documentary evidence which I desire to present, but I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator was through. I shall take the floor in my own right later on.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the testimony which has been read is that of Governor Sheakley, who for two terms was governor of the Territory of Alaska. I have similar testimony from every other governor since Alaska became a part of the United States; but I shall not weary the Senate by offering more than one additional piece of documentary evidence, which is the report of Mr. Howard M. Kutchin, special agent of the Treasury Department for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska. He is a gentleman who for twenty-five years was a leading journalist in the State of Wisconsin; he is a writer of great force, a gentleman of varied and extensive experience, who went to Alaska without any bias in favor of or prejudice against the sale of liquor in that Territory. He was specially instructed by the Treasury Department to investigate the subject-matter and to embody his conclusions in a report to the Secretary of the Treasury, which he has done. I now ask to have the Secretary read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE LIQUOR QUESTION.

I am directed by my instructions to "report to the Department any violations of the law relating to the introduction of liquors into the Territory of Alaska." To do so would consume more space than I would be justified in giving to this report. There is nothing but violation. The law is practically a dead letter. The utter disregard of it is so universal that the situation is little short of grotesque. The conditions are such that the laws of the land, in this regard, are absolutely inoperative, and an enactment designed for the good of the people, and justified by what was supposed to be an imperative need, has become a by-word and reproach.

This might seem strong language, but it is more than warranted by the admission of ex-Judge Delany, made to me while he was in office, that it would be impossible to secure a conviction in the courts of Alaska of any person complained of for an infraction of that section of the organic law which provides that "the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in said District, except for mechanical, scientific, and medicinal purposes, is hereby prohibited, under the penalties which are provided in section 1955 of the Revised Statutes for the wrongful importation of distilled spirits. And the President of the United States shall make such regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

Even if there has been no lapse, negligence, or failure on the part of the officials charged with this great responsibility, yet it is a fact that absolutely admits of no contradiction that if there were no laws whatever on the statute books regarding the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating spirits the traffic in Alaska could not possibly be more open and notorious. The remarkable spectacle is here presented of an undisguised contempt for the laws of this Government, and a parallel is not to be found elsewhere on this continent where the American flag floats as an emblem of authority.

Why this anomalous condition of things should be found here, and here alone, may excite wonderment, but it is not difficult to demonstrate why this is so. A large proportion of the population of Alaska is composed of persons who scorn temperance legislation of any kind, and who especially believe that sumptuary laws are an invasion of reserved private rights. Furthermore, they persist in regarding the special-tax stamp of the Internal-Revenue Bureau, which is to be found in every saloon—totally unfounded as is that assumption—as a license issued by the Government for the protection of the business.

The situation is utterly incongruous, and it is scarcely surprising that no jury can be impaneled that will return a verdict against a violator of the law. The result is that there is practically no restriction of the traffic. In the city of Juneau, with a population of 3,000 or 4,000, there are said to be upward of forty saloons, and in Sitka, the seat of government, there are probably a dozen; and there are several breweries operated without a semblance of disguise. All attempts of Government officials to stamp them out have proved mere vanity and vexation of spirit. The seizure of a few bottles of liquor is smilingly submitted to, and after the departure of the officers the culprits come up cheerfully with a new supply, easily procured from some secret cache, and are ready for the next raid.

It would be strange if, under these conditions, the officers of the law did not become discouraged and vote the effort to do their duty in this regard a sheer waste of energy. So we see the result: A prohibition district where the unrestricted sale of intoxicants discounts any region that professes to confine the traffic within any sort of limits, and where the whole people are really put at a disadvantage on account of laws meant for their good. There can hardly be any exaggeration of the deplorable failure of the law, and I am free to say that I can not see how there can be any valid argument favoring its retention on the statute books, without some new and successful means for its enforcement. It was originally adopted, no doubt, as a necessary protection of the natives of Alaska against the use of liquor, and this spirit might possibly well be applied to all people.

But it remains a fact that throughout the country general laws forbid the sale of intoxicants to the aborigines, and there is no apparent reason why these laws could not be made to cover the natives of Alaska, thus removing the necessity for the law affecting the entire population. Certainly, all interests would now be best subserved by the repeal of existing statutes and the adoption of a law similar to that in force in other regions where the Congress prescribes the conditions of this traffic. In the Territories and the District of Columbia there is no such situation as we find in Alaska, and the good government of the latter, in some notable respects the most promising portion of this great domain now under the direct control of the central Government, presents no adequate or logical justification for a system which was perhaps even originally based upon false premises, and which now offers no excuse for the continuation of a policy that manifestly can not be enforced.

During my tour through the District I talked with all sorts and conditions of men on this topic, and from the free-and-easy citizen, who cares little for the moral aspect of the case, to the missionary and the man devoted heart and soul to the uplifting of his kind, I think I may say that there was no exception to the opinion that "something must be done," and that there is scarcely any change conceivable that would not be an improvement upon existing conditions. The whole people are shocked and shamed by the report that in a "prohibition" community, where there were apprehensions that a food famine was imminent, whisky came in in undesired abundance, while bread was scarce. A consensus of the best opinion of Alaska I infer to be that the countenancing of the liquor traffic by the imposition of a license would be the best escape from what is now a maddening and intolerable situation, and which would be ludicrous did it not embody conditions which seriously reflect upon the majesty of a great Government.

From conversations with many persons in all walks of life, it is my conclusion that a high license—say from $800 to $1,200—would come nearer to a proper and satisfactory adjustment of the vexed question than any other remedy available. It was urged, with reason, that Congress licenses the traffic in the District of Columbia, and that there could be no valid objection upon the part of the most captious to similar action in this case. Such a license, it is believed, would restrict the number of saloons to a reasonable proportion as compared with the ratio in States and Territories where similar laws are in vogue, and afford an escape from the anarchistic conditions which now obtain in Alaska in this regard.

There is another phase of the question which, though purely a sordid and mercenary one, and possibly not entitled to consideration where so many on a higher moral plane clamor for recognition, I do not feel justified in ignoring, and that is, that under the present system substantially all the wine, spirits, and malt beverage taken into Alaska are supplied by foreign merchants, and thus a large amount of trade is placed beyond the reach of our own people.

While I am free to admit that this is a low view to take of the question and that there are ample reasons outside of this for a modification of the law, it still must be acknowledged that it is not without a decent bearing upon the case, and in these days, when we are striving by reciprocity measures and otherwise to increase the trade resources of the country, it is a blind policy to cut off from our citizens a wide extent of our own territory, which already makes large demands for supplies and promises at no distant day to become an empire for the patronage of which nations may compete without discredit.

Certain it is that upon every moral and economic consideration here is a question that raises a stentorian voice for readjustment; and such are the enormities practiced under existing laws, or the practical absence of all law, that there can scarcely be any change that would not be welcomed by all classes of citizens. The very men who are now compelled to occupy the attitude of lawbreakers while paying tribute to the Government would hail such a change with satisfaction. The citizen who disapproves of all legalizing of the liquor traffic would prefer this to existing lawlessness; and the collector of customs, who is pestered unceasingly for permits for the importation of intoxicants, which he is morally certain, nine times out of ten, operate to evade the spirit of the law and make a dupe of him, would be relieved of a most disagreeable responsibility.

I would be glad to present the converse of the distressing picture here outlined, but must confess that my artistic capabilities are unequal to the demand. So far as I know, there is no converse, and I can most urgently recommend that there should be speedy action in the premises, and that it take something the form here suggested.

Respectfully submitted. HOWARD M. KUTCHIN,
Agent for Protection of Alaska Salmon Fisheries.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. PERKINS. I could produce hundreds of other documents, but I shall not weary the Senate with any more documentary evidence. I have only a few words to say. The body of the proposed amendment is similar to the law relating to the District of Columbia for the sale of intoxicating and spirituous drinks. If, as has been stated by my friend the Senator from New Hampshire, the District of Columbia does not pay into the Treasury, or into the general fund of which the General Government pays one-half, the amount it receives for licensing saloons, and therefore the statement that the Government thereby becomes a party to the same is untrue, I think it can not be controverted that the money received for saloon licenses is paid into a fund for the support of the District government, and the appropriations would amount to just that much more money if we did not receive the revenue from that source. But I did not wish by implication to reflect upon the government of this city. I think it is wisely adjusted so far as the restriction of the sale of spirituous liquor is concerned.

I wish to state in passing that although I have received petition after petition praying to have the sale of liquor in the public buildings of this city restricted, I know of no place where liquor is on sale in any public building of this Government in this city. I think there is a misapprehension throughout the country upon that subject-matter.

The suggestion made by my friend that it is not practicable to have prohibition in this city because we have foreign diplomats and foreign representatives here is certainly without force and effect, for by the comity of nations and by our treaties with other countries the home of the ambassador or the representative of a foreign country here is his own country as much so as if he had never taken departure from it. But my observation has taught me that such representatives here are quite as temperate as those of our own country and our own people, and I merely reverted to the District of Columbia for the purpose of illustration. I have offered this testimony to show that in Alaska the only way to deal with this illicit traffic is by high license, by controlling it, and not by inviting disrespect for the law, not by offering a premium for smuggling, which has prevailed there year after year.

Mr. WILSON. May I interrupt the Senator from California for a moment?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I have taken considerable interest in the remarks of the Senator from California, who has had large experience in Alaska. His amendment provides for licenses of two kinds, wholesale and retail, one at $2,000 per annum, and one, I believe, at $1,500 per annum.

Mr. PERKINS. According to population.

Mr. WILSON. Under the population clause. With the conditions which prevail in Alaska, both climatic and as to population, the latter scattered over a vast area of territory, the country made up of camps and sparsely settled communities, if we are going into the license business we ought to have another class. There should be three classes, for a license of $1,500 or $2,000 would act in the nature of prohibition in those small and sparsely settled communities, and therefore we would have the old conditions of smuggling which the Senator wishes to have discontinued and which it is proper should be discontinued.

Mr. PERKINS. There is some force in the argument of my friend the Senator from Washington. In fixing this high license I had in view the fact that all the liquor, or 90 per cent of it, that is now sent into Alaska pays no internal-revenue tax to this Government. They save $1.10 a gallon, because it is Canadian liquor which is sent into that country.

Mr. WILSON. Do I interrupt the Senator from California?

Mr. PERKINS. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON. I am rather inclined to differ, although I hesitate to do so, with the Senator from California in that statement. He has examined it much more closely than I have, but to my positive knowledge a vast amount of liquor goes out of Puget Sound. We have done everything in our power at Port Townsend to stop it. If it goes in that way, it certainly would have to pay the internal-revenue tax.

Mr. PERKINS. Perhaps the Senator is correct that a very large percentage is so shipped, but yet every shipowner and every ship manager are, with vigilant eyes, watching to see that no liquors are shipped from the United States to Alaska. No merchant will present his invoice to the custom-house asking a clearance with liquor upon the manifest, because it is a violation of the law. That is why I claim that this law, which has been upon our statute books for thirty years, since we have had control of Alaska, instead of inviting respect and veneration for the law, has invited disrespect, disregard. It has offered a premium for smugglers. No less a gentleman than Judge Daily, who was for so many years upon the bench in Alaska, appointed by President Cleveland, I think, under his first Administration, said it was impossible to find any jury which would convict one for selling liquor when the Government issued him an internal-revenue license to sell liquor.

This is the testimony of everyone who has been there. The report of Mr. Kutchin was recently read from the desk. Who is so capable, who is so competent as he and others who have resided in Alaska to give an opinion of what should be done to restrict this odious and illicit traffic in that Territory? With all respect to my friend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], who, I believe, has never been in Alaska, I think the testimony of those who have lived in the Territory for twenty years or more should have far more weight than those who come here weaving a beautiful theory and saying this great Government should not do so and so, when it is doing it every day, and when he or I or any other man can go and buy an internal-revenue license to sell liquors in the Territory.

Mr. President, I do not care to trespass longer upon the Senate, but I wish to reiterate that which I said when I commenced. This amendment is in the interest of good morals, in the interest of good government, in the interest of temperance, for our Government has made an ignominious failure in attempting to prohibit. Now let us see if our Government, with the aid of public sentiment, by having the cooperation of everyone who takes out a license, with the adoption of this amendment, can not control the traffic in spirituous liquors in that Territory.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the speech of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] is not a new one. It has been made over and over again in this country in favor of licensing the liquor traffic; and yet death, sorrow, suffering, and devastation go along as the result of this traffic wherever it has been licensed.

I notice in scanning the provisions of the amendment presented by the Senator from California, which is somewhat voluminous, that he proposes to tax communities of 1,500 people $1,500 for the privilege of drinking whisky, rum, gin, brandy, and beer legally. In other words, before the rumseller can make a dollar profit he must sell to every man, woman, and child in that community one dollar's worth of a liquid which always does and always will do that individual and his family harm. I take it the Senator from California expects that the traffic will go on under the proposed law. I take it he is not here intending by this proposition to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks in the Territory of Alaska, and I repeat that under the provisions of the proposed amendment there must be a per capita consumption of liquor in towns of 1,500 inhabitants in Alaska of one dollar's worth before the dealer can get any profit in his business.

Mr. President, human language is not eloquent enough, uttered by any man, to express the amount of evil that will come to those people if they drink whisky enough in that Territory to make the business profitable under the provisions of this amendment.

I said a moment ago that I had given very little attention to this matter, my work being in other directions; but during the last half hour, while the Senator from California and the Senator from Montana have been advocating the amendment, I have glanced at the bill and its provisions. It strikes me as very singular that we can not pass a bill for the government of the Territory of Alaska without projecting the liquor question into our discussion.

Had this amendment which is now proposed been incorporated in the bill in its original form, a hearing upon that measure would have been demanded by men and women in this country, who have a right to be heard before the committees of the Congress of the United States. Had it gone out to the religious and the temperance people of the country that in this bill relating to the Territory of Alaska, a Territory in which all the people of this country have an equal interest, such a proposition was involved, I say a demand would have come up here, as it has come up to me by letter and by telegram, that a hearing should be accorded to the people who are opposed to this provision.

In view of that fact, I give notice now that I shall move to recommit the bill for the purpose of giving the churches, the Sabbath schools, and the good people of this country an opportunity by representatives to come here and present their side of the controversy and to say why, in their opinion, this amendment should not be incorporated into the proposed law.

Mr. President, I have little hope, unless my motion to recommit prevails, that the wise amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota will be adopted; but that is no reason why I should remain silent, or why I can be excused for refraining to oppose the unwise amendment submitted by the Senator from California. The Senators from Montana and California say that liquors are being sold in Alaska in violation of law. That is undoubtedly true. Liquor is being sold in every State of the American Union in violation of law, and in every country on the face of the earth, but that is no argument in favor of licensing the liquor traffic. The Senator from Montana knows that every crime in the catalogue is being committed in the Territory of Alaska in violation of law, and it would be just as consistent for the Senator to stand here and offer an amendment licensing bawdy houses in the Territory of Alaska as to license the traffic in intoxicating liquors on the ground that the prohibitory law is being violated in that Territory.

Mr. President, a great many hundreds of years ago, amid the thunders and the lightnings of Mount Sinai, a prohibitory law was given to the world. Has it not been violated? That law says, "Thou shalt not kill; * * * thou shalt not steal." Yet in every civilized community on the face of the earth the provisions of that prohibitory law are being violated, and stealing and killing are flagrant. Is that any reason why that great prohibitory law should be repealed? Is it any reason why the Ten Commandments should be blotted out, and why we should say, because its provisions are violated, and oftentimes those violating them escape punishment, it is ineffective and we ought to grant license to commit those crimes under legislative restrictions?

Mr. President, the Senator from California has had documents read to show that the law is not being enforced, and that it can not be enforced. I have in my hand the report of the governor of the District of Alaska to the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1897—Governor Bradly, and turning to his report I find that in discussing this question he says:

> During the last term of court the judge made a strenuous effort to enforce the law against this large class of offenders—

That is, the class of offenders against the prohibitory law in that Territory—> and a number of convictions were secured. It was a demonstration that the law could be upheld if the officers of the court were determined to do it.

That seems to be valuable testimony in opposition to the views of the Senators from Montana and California.

It is claimed by some that alcoholic liquors are a necessity in a cold climate. That is not true. Science proves to the contrary. All the arguments which have been made by some learned men that human beings must consume alcohol to be healthy have been disproved by scientific facts over and over again. It is futile for me to waste time to refute that doctrine, because it has been refuted by men whose learning and attainments are so much greater than mine. It is sufficient for me to simply call attention to that fact.

The Senator from Montana and the Senator from California say they advocate this amendment in the interest of temperance, of good morals, and of the best interests of the people of the Territory of Alaska. Mr. President, licensed whisky leads to crime just as well as unlicensed whisky, and I have yet to see any community where the consumption of intoxicating drinks has ever been decreased by licensing their sale, while I know from personal observation that there are States and communities in this country, no matter what some men may have said to the contrary, where the consumption of intoxicating drinks has been very greatly reduced by prohibitory laws.

The Senator from California says that his proposed amendment does not allow liquor to be sold to the Indians, but every wise and observing man knows that if liquor is sold under license in the Territory of Alaska it will be sold to the Indians, if they have money enough to buy it. Everybody knows that; and, Mr. President, I am not quite clear why, if liquor is to be sold to my boy and to your boy in Alaska, under license from the Government of the United States, under the ægis of this great Government of ours, it should not be sold to the Indians as well as to your boy and to my boy. The measure provides that liquor shall not be sold to minors or to habitual drunkards; but I say here to-day that if liquor is to be sold to anybody in this country, let it be sold to habitual drunkards, and not to the boys of this country who are just forming their habits of life. Let us not make them drunkards, but let us sell it to the confirmed drunkards and get rid of them, rather than to bring our boys down to the condition those drunkards are in at the present time.

For myself I want the liquor traffic in Alaska kept under the ban of law. I want it to be outlawed in that Territory, which is owned and governed by the United States of America. The traffic in intoxicating liquors is iniquitous and immoral wherever it is carried on, and as such it has no right to ask to be shielded in its wretched work by this great Government, and I shall never vote for any such proposition.

Mr. President, we talk about the possible loss of life in a conflict with Spain, but the history of this world and statistics show that intoxicants destroy more human lives than war, pestilence, and famine combined. Yet the proposition is that this great Government shall go into partnership with a business of that nature. Honorable Senators stand here and make earnest and eloquent speeches in behalf of this Government entering into such a partnership, and that we shall give our consent to a traffic that produces evil, and nothing but evil, and that continually.

Allusion has been made to the District of Columbia and to the law on the statute books in the District. I voted against that law. When it was up for consideration in the Senate, I recorded my vote against the proposition that we should license this immoral traffic in the District. But I want to call the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that his proposed amendment extending liquor license to the District of Alaska has not the safeguards around it found in the law we passed for the government of the District of Columbia in that regard.

Mr. CARTER. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that the amendment is an exact copy of the law for the District of Columbia, except as to the amount of the license.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not. There are a great many safeguards in that law, and I have a very distinct recollection of them, because I had something to do with putting them in, that are not found in the proposed amendment. The Senator from Montana will find that to be the fact if he reads the law relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, the Senator from California is mistaken when he says the Government takes one-half of the revenues of the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia for its own use. The fact is that the District of Columbia takes the revenue from the liquor traffic and applies it toward the one-half payment it makes for carrying on the affairs of the District, and the General Government has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. PERKINS. Would not the Government have to appropriate that much more if it were not for the receipts from liquor licenses?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. The District of Columbia would have to pay it. If they did not get it from one source, they would have to get it from some other source.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the Government grant internal-revenue licenses?

Mr. GALLINGER. That I admit. We all know that the Government does grant internal-revenue licenses, which I regret, but it has been decided over and over again that that does not give a man a right to sell intoxicating liquors if the State or the Territory or the community says that he shall not sell intoxicating drinks. It gives him no right whatever to sell intoxicating drinks in opposition to the laws of a State or community—none whatever.

Mr. President, I do not care to prolong this controversy. I am quite willing that the matter shall be voted upon. I have an utter contempt for a full-grown man who stands behind a saloon bar dealing out liquid damnation to his fellow-citizens, and I never shall vote to grant him that opportunity. If the Senate of the United States wishes to do it, then, of course, I shall yield, as I always yield, and as I am compelled to yield, to the views of a majority of my fellow-Senators.

Mr. President, there is a prohibitory law on the statute books to-day of the Territory of Alaska, and back of that prohibitory law is the great Government of the United States. Let the Government enforce that law. Does any man tell me that the Government of the United States can not enforce a law relating to liquor selling as well as to other things? Does any man tell me that we ought to admit that this great Government can not enforce its own decrees when they are on the statute books of the United States?

Mr. President, if one set of officials will not do their duty toward executing that law, let them be removed and another set of officials put in their place who will do their duty in the execution of the law. I would feel humiliated if I believed for one single moment that this great Government could not execute a law in the Territory of Alaska relating to liquor selling as well as a law on any other subject. If we are to repeal the existing law and license this traffic because the law is not enforced in its entirety, then let us be consistent and repeal all other laws relating to all other classes of immorality on the same ground, because the laws relating to other things in Alaska are not enforced any more than are those relating to the liquor traffic in that Territory.

Mr. President, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss this question, as duty calls me immediately to a meeting of the Committee on Foreign Relations; but I wish to say that I am opposed to the amendment, and that in opposing the amendment I express the sentiment, I have no doubt, of the best element of the State which I in part represent here. I believe the temperance people of the country are all against this amendment. I desire to read a letter which I received this morning from Hon. Hiram Price. He is from Iowa and was formerly a member of Congress. He has reached the age of 84 years. His intellect is as clear as it ever was, and his devotion to the cause of temperance is as it always has been. He is president of the American Anti-Saloon League and is now a resident of Washington. He says:

> AMERICAN ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE,
> Washington, D. C., March 29, 1898.
> DEAR SIR: I have just received a letter from a reliable source saying that a bill has been introduced by Senator PERKINS authorizing the licensing of the liquor traffic in Alaska. If such is the case, I hope it may be defeated. I need not say to you that the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage (licensed or unlicensed) is an unmixed evil, and that licensing an evil can not by possibility make it a virtue.

We are now ready to go to war with Spain for allowing the destruction of some 300 of our sailors; but the liquor traffic, according to the testimony of competent and disinterested witnesses, establishes the fact that thousands of our people are slaughtered every year by the liquor traffic. Licensing a vice can not by possibility make it a virtue. The testimony of our highest legal tribunals agree in the opinion that not less than 80 per cent of the inmates of our prisons (State and national) are there because of the liquor traffic. I am aware of the fact that the advocates of the license system plead as an excuse for and a justification of their course that if the law forbids the sale it will be sold in violation of law. Doubtless to some extent this is true. But if this is a good reason against the passage of the law, then all laws against evil and crime should be repealed, because all such laws, both Divine and human, have been and are being violated some place by somebody ever since from the summit of smoking Sinai—

Great minds run in the same channel—

smoking Sinai by the mouth of the Eternal laws were promulgated for the observance of mankind and for the punishment of evildoers. I take the liberty of troubling you with this matter because I suppose you are a member of the committee to which this matter may be referred, and because I believe you are in sympathy with any movement for the purpose of lessening the evils of the liquor traffic.

Your friend,

H. PRICE.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the pending business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of considering a joint resolution which I propose to report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 199) to postpone the opening of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, to report it favorably with an amendment. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the time fixed by the Indian appropriation act approved June 7, 1897, for opening to location and entry under all land laws of the United States the lands of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation in Utah, under the limitations and exceptions as therein provided, be, and the same is hereby, extended six months from the 1st day of April, 1898: Provided, That nothing herein shall extend to mineral lands other than gilsonite and kindred minerals; and such gilsonite and similar minerals shall continue to be reserved.

The amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to strike out the proviso and to insert in lieu thereof:

Provided, That all lands within said reservation other than agricultural land and lands known to contain asphaltum, elaterite, or gilsonite shall be open and subject to entry under the mineral-land laws of the United States on and after April 1, 1898, and such gilsonite, elaterite, and asphaltum lands shall continue to be reserved.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to hear the joint resolution read again.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. NELSON. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I very much hope the Senator from Minnesota will not object. Day after to-morrow all these lands become open to entry under the mineral and agricultural land laws of the United States if the joint resolution does not pass. If we pass the joint resolution, the agricultural lands will be reserved for six months more, so that allotments can be made to these Indians. It is a House joint resolution. It is presented at the request of the Interior Department for this purpose.

Mr. NELSON. The amendment is not a House provision. It is an amendment that was put on by the committee here. If you will allow the joint resolution to be passed as it came over from the House, I shall have no objection; but the amendment opens the doors wide, so that all the gilsonite land can be taken.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It does nothing of the sort. It especially and expressly reserves the gilsonite and does not disturb its condition at all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest that the joint resolution as proposed to be amended be read again. I am satisfied the Senator from Minnesota did not understand it. It is the purpose of the amendment to except the gilsonite from this proposition and leave it outside of the law absolutely, as it stands now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution as proposed to be amended.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Senators will notice that there is an express provision that all gilsonite and elaterite lands shall be reserved. They are not open to settlement. The provision of the law passed a year ago did not touch that class of land, and this is an express provision that the opening of the other lands in the reservation under the mineral-land laws shall not apply to the land in which gilsonite is found.

Mr. NELSON. The joint resolution extends the time for six months for taking the gilsonite lands.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Not at all.

Mr. NELSON. The original joint resolution——

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all; nothing of the sort.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Not at all. Will the Senator let the Secretary again read the first part of the joint resolution? I am sure there is a misunderstanding as to it. A year ago there was a provision put on the appropriation act providing for the opening of certain parts of that land. The gilsonite land was excepted then. It did not come under the operation of the act at all. The joint resolution simply gives the Secretary of the Interior six months more time within which to provide for the opening of the agricultural lands that are in the reservation. The Department has not been able to prepare the lands for opening up to this time, and asks, as I understand, for six months more time in which to be ready for the opening to take place; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota still insist on his objection?

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me the joint resolution ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands instead of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator still insist on his objection?

Mr. NELSON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to withhold his objection a moment until I can explain this matter. I think he will then withdraw his objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the matter disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter is disposed of. The Senator from Minnesota objects, and the joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3729) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to withdraw the motion I made a moment ago to recommit the bill under consideration, understanding that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] proposes to make a point of order against the amendment on the ground that it raises revenue—a point of order that I think will lie.

Mr. WILSON. Before the Senator from North Dakota submits his point of order, I desire to make a statement in reference to a single remark made by the Senator from New Hampshire. I happen to know the officer who is charged with the enforcement of the law relative to keeping out liquors from the District of Alaska. I have known him for many years. He is a man of integrity and good character, and he has been and is doing now everything within his power to enforce the law in the District of Alaska. Unfortunately, this great Government of ours neglects to provide him with any facilities whatever to enforce the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2680) amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order may be for the time being laid aside to the end that the pending bill may be disposed of. I suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that in all probability the pending measure will be disposed of inside of thirty minutes. It being a matter of great moment to the District of Alaska to have some system of government adequate to the situation, I trust the Senator will accede to the request.

Mr. CAFFERY. I am very anxious to conclude what I have to say on the bill which is the unfinished business. With the understanding that the debate on the measure which the Senator from Montana desires to prolong will not last over thirty minutes or such a matter, I will yield.

Mr. WILSON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the regular order be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, and the Senator from Washington is recognized.

Mr. WILSON. I simply desire, in justice to this gentleman, whom I know so well, and those with whom I am acquainted, intrusted with the enforcement of the law in Alaska, to state what they are doing or attempting to do.

The collector at Port Townsend has done everything in his power by searching all vessels to stop the shipment of liquors into Alaska. If some system of a license or some kind of a law is not to be given to Alaska, I hope that those gentlemen who are so much interested in the enforcement of the present law upon the statute books will assist us in securing appropriations of a sufficient amount to give us men to enforce the law. The collector in Alaska to-day has a vast area of country to guard, and he is absolutely without any facilities whatever. He has not even a small boat to get around among the islands where liquor is cached in order to arrest smugglers in that District. Congress continues to talk and talk and prate about morality and the enforcement of law, but will not give the appropriations to carry the law into effect.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Washington permit me?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am sure my friend the Senator from Washington will not include me in that category. The Senator must know that one of the tenets of my political faith is to vote for pretty much everything that the great West and Northwest ask for. The Senator must mean the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am not a member.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I certainly had no personal reference to the Senator from New Hampshire. I leave personal allusions to the Senator himself, who is very apt always in making them when he has the floor. I simply state the fact that to-day in the great District of Alaska the collector of internal revenue, who is intrusted with the enforcement of law, has no facilities with which to carry the law into effect; and yet here upon the floor of the United States Senate they are indirectly, if not directly, charged with the lack of enforcement of the law.

Now, it makes no difference whether the point of order is made against this amendment or not, because I am inclined to believe that the Chair will rule favorably. Liquor selling will continue to go on in that District as it has gone on, as stated by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], for thirty years. It will be smuggled into Alaska in every way, in every manner, and in every form. Therefore, knowing something of the conditions, I have thought it advisable that we might in some way upon a bill here adopt a high-license system, a great deal higher license than the District of Columbia Committee has enforced upon this District. I should like to get a little nearer home in this prohibition matter if we are to have it.

Mr. President, I am not myself in favor of the sale of intoxicating liquors. I do not think I look like a man who is in the habit of using intoxicants to excess or to a large degree. I do not think my features are swollen and distorted by the use of intoxicating liquors. The mere fact is that I have never in my life tasted liquor of any kind or of any character; but I have been in favor of enacting some law in the District of Alaska whereby we can enforce and restrain the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to say only one word. If our friends who are opposed to this measure are not willing to permit it to come to a vote to test the sense of the Senate, it will undoubtedly go out upon the point of order. In reference to the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that the temperance people of the country had not had an opportunity of being heard upon this question, I desire to say that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] two years ago introduced a similar amendment. I introduced one three years ago and another one two years ago. Several amendments having the same object in view that is embodied in this amendment have been before the Committee on Territories for all these years, and not one single protest, I am informed, has ever been filed either in the Senate or in that committee against the high licensing and control of the sale of liquors in the Territories.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, as this amendment is clearly designed to raise revenue, and is, therefore, in my mind, a violation of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution, I make the point of order that it is a violation of the Constitution and has no place on the bill.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the Senator from North Dakota to make that point of order as against the entire amendment, and not as against any portion of it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I make it against the entire amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not care to discuss the point of order, because I think that is conclusive; but I would ask the Senator from North Dakota to withhold the matter until I make a single observation.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will withhold the point of order for a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply want to say, in response to the Senator from Washington, that I did not indulge in any undue or unfair criticisms of the officials of the Territory of Alaska. If any criticism was made by me, it was made against the Government of the United States.

I desire to repeat what I said to the Senator from Washington, that whenever the great West or the great Northwest, who have in charge the legislation for this Territory, want additional appropriations for the purpose of executing the laws, they will find no Senator more ready to vote for those appropriations than I. I have invariably voted for appropriations of that kind, whether they related to the execution of law or were for the furtherance of the best interests of the people in that part of our great country, and I have no anticipation of changing my practice in that regard.

Neither did I intentionally, Mr. President, utter a word that would seem to imply that I felt that the Senators who are pressing this amendment are not good temperance men. I certainly did not mean to say anything of the kind. I spoke on the question in its broad sense. I think that my remarks as they shall be printed in the RECORD will bear me out in the statement that I did not make any narrow application of them that could possibly have been offensive to anybody.

Mr. WILSON. I did not so understand the Senator, but my recollection is that he stated if the officers in Alaska were not enforcing the law or performing their duty they should be removed. I speak only from memory in quoting the Senator from New Hampshire that far.

Mr. GALLINGER. I said that, exactly.

Mr. WILSON. And I sought to speak for the present collector of internal revenue for the District of Alaska, who I know is seeking by every means in his power to enforce the laws as they stand upon the statute books to-day.

Mr. President, I could relate if I wished other things that would convince the mind of any Senator that the collector of internal revenue for that District is a man of honesty of character, of integrity, who under the greatest disadvantages possible is seeking to carry out the law in that District. I do not speak for him as an appointee from my State, because he was appointed from a neighboring State, but I have known him for many years, and he has complained to me bitterly of the failure of this great Government of ours to assist him in the administration of the law or the enforcement of it in that District.

The collector at Port Townsend, as I before stated, is doing everything in his power. But no matter how honest or how capable or how energetic or how industrious these officers may be, you will find it absolutely unavailing to restrict the sale of liquor in the District of Alaska. The conditions which surround that District will bring this about.

Mr. President, personally to the Senator from New Hampshire I am under many obligations, and the people of my section are under many obligations to him. He has assisted us in many ways, and nothing was further from my intention than to say anything that that honorable Senator might construe in any unkind manner as far as he is concerned or the duties that he performs upon the floor of the United States Senate. I know, Mr. President, that whatever he tries to do he tries to do well.

Mr. MCBRIDE. Mr. President, I was necessarily absent from the Chamber during the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] alluded to by the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON], but in relation to the character and the integrity of the collector of customs for the District of Alaska I can speak advisedly. I have been acquainted with that officer for many years. I know him to be an honest and, in the discharge of his duty as an officer, an absolutely fearless man. I know that in the discharge of his duties as collector of customs for that District within the last year he has seized more liquor attempted to be smuggled into that District in violation of law, within the period of sixty days after his induction into office, than was seized during the whole four years of the incumbency of his predecessor in that office. Upon a single trip of a steamship from the District of Alaska to the State of Oregon the present collector brought 20 tons of whisky that he had seized which had been smuggled into that District in violation of law.

I wish to add my testimony to that of the Senator from Washington, that without an army of a thousand deputies it is impossible for that collector or any other man to enforce strictly the prohibition laws in that District. It is impossible. The application of the term "license" to the measure of restriction and regulation which is proposed by the amendment that has been under discussion here is a misnomer. On the contrary, the enactment and enforcement of that amendment for the purposes indicated would be, in my judgment, the most effective restriction and regulation of the liquor traffic in Alaska that it is possible to effect by law. I do believe it to be impossible, as I said before, without an army of a thousand deputies, to enforce strictly the prohibition law in that Territory, with a coast line of more than 3,000 miles.

Mr. PERKINS. Twenty thousand.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I mean the coast line by the route usually traveled by steamers and now under the patrol of the deputies and the inspectors under the collector of customs.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I renew my point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what seems to me a correct view of the point of order upon what I concede to be a very brief reflection upon the subject and a very limited examination of the questions involved.

The point of order is made that this proposed amendment is not in order because in violation of section 7, Article I, of the Federal Constitution, which reads as follows:

> All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

That section of the Constitution was manifestly intended by the framers of the instrument to leave with the popular branch of Congress the framing of purely revenue bills. In the language of Justice Story:

> Here it means what are technically called money bills. In practice it is applied to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the word.

In support of this view the commentator cites authorities.

Mr. President, the pending amendment is not a bill originating in the Senate in violation of that section of the Constitution for the purpose of raising revenue. It is presented as an amendment to a bill making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and is intended to be a part and parcel of the proposed civil government of Alaska. It contemplates the regulation of trade and traffic within the limits of that District.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. I suggest, as the United States have complete jurisdiction over the Territories, why have not the United States as complete police power within that territorial jurisdiction as a State has within its territorial jurisdiction? A grant of license to sell liquor is a part of the police power and can be exercised independent of the power of taxation.

Mr. CARTER. The suggestion of the Senator is indeed apt and in line with the observations I intended to make. We provide in this bill for a governor for that District, for the establishment of certain courts of justice, for the appointment under the law of a United States marshal, for the construction of jails, and for the recording of instruments relating to titles within the various subdivisions of the District of Alaska which may be prescribed by the orders of the court.

Now, sir, within this bill we provide that persons having instruments to record within the district prescribed by the court shall pay a fee equivalent to double the fee for like services charged under the laws of the State of Oregon. That fee goes to the recording officer as a part of his compensation. In this particular case we think it wise and prudent to regulate a great variety of business transactions conducted and liable to be conducted within the District, and this amendment proceeds to recapitulate the kinds of business it is desirable that the law should regulate and control.

Amongst other things, it seems to be desirable that abstract offices should be licensed—not that the $50 per year collected from the abstract offices is essential to the continuance of operations by the United States Government in Alaska, but to the end, if you please, that a proper police regulation may be established with reference to this class of business, and that persons who have business with the abstract offices and persons engaged in abstracting titles may know who is authorized by law to transact that sort of business upon a legitimate basis and who is not so authorized. I might apply this to the hotels that are to be run and the restaurants and the various kinds of trade and traffic to be conducted within the District.

It is true, Mr. President, that as a necessary incident to the regulation, certain moneys will be paid to the clerk of the court for the license, a part of which will constitute his fee for the issuance of the license, and a part of which shall be paid out for the current expenses of the court by the clerk under the orders of the court, and a certain part, if a surplus there be, shall pass into the Treasury of the United States.

From the brief consideration I have been permitted here on the floor to give to this subject, it appears to me as clear and distinct that this license scheme is not essentially a revenue measure within the meaning of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution. Who thinks of raising revenue in Alaska to run the Government of the United States or any considerable part or portion of it? The fact that in regulating the traffic of the country certain financial benefits inure to the United States does not of necessity make the measure itself a revenue measure. The United States, as suggested by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], has complete jurisdiction over the District of Alaska.

There exists no local legislative government or municipality qualified under the law to enforce any kind or character of regulation on any business being transacted within that country. Hence, in the proper consideration of a bill by this body, which is not a revenue bill, but a bill to provide a government for a section of the country with which the Federal Government is charged exclusively, we merely happen to have, as an incident, a section which might result incidentally in the raising of revenue. I believe the amendment, properly considered, must be considered as one which will enforce a proper police regulation in the District of Alaska, and which only incidentally provides for revenue in that behalf.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I respectfully suggest that the question as to whether or not the pending amendment is unconstitutional is not a question for the Chair to decide. I do not think the Presiding Officer would have the right to rule out any bill or any amendment upon the ground that it was contrary to the Constitution. I think that is a matter which must address itself to the judgment and the conscience of each Senator, and it is not a question upon which a point of order can be made. It may be an argument against a particular bill or amendment that it is a revenue measure, and that would undoubtedly be an argument which would address itself to the judgment of the Senate, and if the Senate so believed, they would not adopt it; but I do not think any rule can be found whereby the Presiding Officer can say that a resolution, a bill, or an amendment shall not be considered by the Senate because he thinks that it violates some provision of the Constitution.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not understand that the point of order is that the bill is unconstitutional——

Mr. BERRY. The amendment.

Mr. HOAR. That the amendment is unconstitutional.

Mr. BERRY. That is the ground upon which the point of order was made, and it was distinctly so stated.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has stated his understanding, and now I will state mine.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that the point of order is that the amendment is unconstitutional. If it were, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] would be clearly right. The proposition is that under the Constitution it is a measure, whether introduced by way of an original bill or by way of an amendment, which can not be lawfully introduced in the Senate. Nobody pretends that this proposition is unconstitutional. The claim is that it is not according to the direction for the proceeding between the two Houses contained in the Constitution. It can only be introduced in the House of Representatives, and can only lawfully be brought to the attention of the Senate by being sent here from the House of Representatives. That is a rule of procedure. It is an absolute and authoritative rule of procedure, and, being found in the Constitution itself, more so than if it were merely found in the rules and orders established by the body by its own authority.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator would rather that I should hear his question after he has first heard my proposition.

Mr. BERRY. Very well; the Senator declines to yield. The Senator invariably, I believe, declines to yield. I beg his pardon.

Mr. HOAR. It is not true that I invariably or ever decline to yield. I prefer, though, to take my own time for having the Senator put his question rather than his time.

I was about saying when the Senator interrupted me that this is a mere question of orderly procedure, and not a question of the constitutionality of the proposition, which everybody agrees Congress has the constitutional power to pass. That being the case, the question for the Chair is whether he can enforce a rule or law of procedure in this body when it is declared by the Constitution, when he not only has the power, but it is his duty and what he sits there for—to enforce precisely the same rule if it were found in the rules of the Senate. Now I will hear the honorable Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I prefer to take the floor in my own right when the Senator gets through.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. President, I suppose this matter was settled long ago by the usages of the Senate, and the Chair will ascertain, or ought to ascertain, at the Secretary's desk, whether the objection that a bill is a bill for raising revenue can be taken as a point of order. It is hardly worth while to discuss it as an original question, because I suppose it will be found settled by the usages of the Senate.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] thinks that this is not a revenue measure, but is a measure for regulating certain industries or trades or transactions in the Territory of Alaska. I suppose that that is true so far as it relates to the proposition which has been discussed by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]—to wit, the regulation of the liquor traffic—but this amendment goes very far beyond that. I do not see how the honorable Senator can justly claim that a proposition which imposes on mercantile establishments doing a business of $100,000 per annum a license fee of $500 per annum, and for doing a business of $75,000 a license of $375, and so on, is a measure intended for the regulation of those establishments, the license being graduated absolutely according to the amount of business they do. It is a revenue measure so far as that part of the bill is concerned. If that be true, a point of order lies to the whole. It is a revenue measure, pure and simple, it seems to me, so far as that clause of the bill goes.

I hope the honorable Senator from Arkansas knows very well that I should like to answer his question if he chooses to put it.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, when I have occupied the floor, I have made it an invariable rule to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts whenever he has requested me to do so. I have more than once requested him to yield, and he has invariably declined. As to whether it is true that he never declines to yield, I leave that to Senators who sit in this Chamber and who have been familiar with the debates. I do not care to get into a dispute with him about that matter. I asked him politely to yield, and he declined.

In regard to the pending proposition, if it were not for the provision in the Constitution that revenue measures shall originate in the House of Representatives, there could be no question but what this amendment could originate here. The Senator from Massachusetts says it is not unconstitutional. I say the only reason why a revenue measure can not originate here is because the Constitution says such a measure shall originate in the other House. If that does not make it unconstitutional for such a measure to originate here, I do not know the meaning of language.

Mr. President, I repeat that it is not a question for the Presiding Officer, it is not a rule, it is a constitutional provision which says that all revenue measures shall originate in the other House of Congress. If what the Senator from Massachusetts argues is true, then it would not rest with the Senate to determine the question raised by the Senator from North Dakota as to whether or not this amendment is obnoxious to that provision of the Constitution which says that revenue measures shall originate in the other House; it would rest with the Presiding Officer.

On the same reasoning, the Presiding Officer could take up any bill which was introduced and say it should not be considered by the Senate because it proposed to raise revenue. It is a question for the Senate to decide, for each Senator to decide for himself according to his judgment and conscience as to whether or not this is a revenue bill within the meaning of the clause contained in the Constitution of the United States. I respectfully submit that it is not a rule, but that it is a constitutional provision; and that if we originate a revenue measure here, we violate that Constitution. It will not do, therefore, for the Senator from Massachusetts to argue that it is not a constitutional question for each Senator to decide for himself, but a rule of procedure to be decided by the Chair. I say that it is a constitutional provision, and is as binding on us as any other provision in the Constitution; that we must construe it for ourselves, and that it is not to be construed for us by the Presiding Officer.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to make one observation as regards the personal question between the Senator from Arkansas and myself. I do not think I ever in my life refused to yield to a Senator who desired to put to me a question. If I have, the occasions have been very few. I have very often, when I was in the middle of a sentence or in the middle of a proposition half stated, refused to allow a Senator to put a question at that point and cut my statement in two in the middle, and lead me away from what I was desiring to talk about to what he was desiring to have me talk about. When the Senator from Arkansas rose to interrupt me, I asked him to allow me to finish my sentence, and stated that when I had done so I would hear him. If he or any other Senator finds anything to object to in that transaction, I will stick to my own view about it.

Mr. BERRY. You will do what?

Mr. HOAR. I say I must stick to my own view about it.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to repeat the proposition. It must be settled by the precedents of the Senate—it is not worth while to discuss it; but the point of order, as I understand it, is not that this measure is unconstitutional, a measure which Congress can not constitutionally pass, but the point of order is that the rules for the order of business governing this body require that measures of this kind shall not originate here, but shall originate elsewhere; and it seems to me that is just as much a question of order or principle, being enacted in the Constitution, as it would be if it were enacted in a rule.

Is not the Constitution a rule of this body? Suppose we undertake to pass a bill without an enacting clause, an enacting clause being prescribed in the Constitution, is there any doubt that it would be the duty of the Chair to hold that that was not one of the measures or bills which the Senate could lawfully deal with? So it seems to me as a matter of original principle that it is the duty of the Chair to enforce this constitutional rule unless the precedents of the Senate shall settle it otherwise.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] seemed to agree that if this was a money bill it was not in order. If this is not a revenue bill, I do not know what it is, for all imaginable business which can be carried on in the Territory of Alaska is to be taxed, and the taxes are not for the purpose in any manner of regulating in the slightest degree the business to be transacted. It can not be asserted that it is the exercise of the police power.

The amendment starts out with providing taxes as follows:

Abstract offices, $50 per annum.
Banks, $250 per annum.
Brokers (money, bill, note, and stock), $100 per annum.
Billiard rooms, $25 per table per annum.
Bowling alleys, $25 per annum.
Breweries, $500 per annum.

And so forth.

Two or three pages of the amendment are devoted to the imposition of license taxes on various trades and pursuits. If the bill should become a general law with that amendment and should be made applicable to all the business of the United States, we would raise more revenue under it than we do under our combined internal-revenue taxes and import duties; and, as suggested to me by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], business would not be transacted in the slightest degree differently from what it would be without the tax.

The whole bill is a revenue bill, as much so as any bill which has passed the Senate for years. The only difference is that in this case the bill does not impose import duties, but it provides internal-revenue taxes.

Mr. WILSON. May I ask the Senator a question not especially on the point of order?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. If the amendment should go out on the point of order, what method will we have for raising revenue to support the government which we are about to create in Alaska, there being no other appropriation made at this time for that purpose?

Mr. TELLER. I think we provide for the judiciary in Alaska from money now in the Treasury. I do not understand that it has ever been the policy of the Government of the United States to exact revenues from the Territories for the payment of officials.

Mr. WILSON. This is the only instance, I believe, on record; but if the Senator will permit me, we have made no provision other than in this bill providing for the establishment of a government in Alaska.

Mr. TELLER. We can make such a provision without any trouble.

The amendment as it now stands is objectionable to the point of order. It is objectionable because it proposes to impose upon the people of the Territory of Alaska a burden which is not imposed upon any other people. I should vote against the amendment if it contained nothing but the mere question of the repeal of existing law as to the sale of liquor in the Territory. I am very much opposed to repealing that law. I believe the law can be fairly well enforced. If, however, there is any more legislation required to enforce it, I shall be happy to join the Senators who think the law is difficult of enforcement in securing that kind of legislation. If this is not a money bill, it is useless to talk about what constitutes a money bill.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I have not read the amendment, but I think I understand its scope as stated by Senators who have argued upon the question of its constitutionality. It appears to be an enactment authorizing the sale of liquors in the Territory of Alaska under certain conditions, grading the license according to the amount of business done. I believe I state it correctly.

If this power can be exercised under any known jurisdiction of the United States as a police power, then it occurs to me that the objection made of the orderly procedure of such a measure as this is not good. If it is in the exercise of the police power possessed by the United States to make all necessary rules and regulations concerning the government of the Territories, then it is not amenable to the constitutional point of being a bill to raise revenue originating in the Senate. All bills to raise revenue must originate in the House of Representatives. But is this a bill to raise revenue? Is it not a bill to regulate the liquor traffic in the Territory of Alaska?

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to line 24 of section 16, being the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]?

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator from Massachusetts draws my attention to the provision in line 24 of the amendment, which reads:

Mercantile establishments: Doing a business of $100,000 per annum, $500 per annum; doing a business of $75,000 per annum, $375 per annum, etc.

This is a license tax upon persons engaged in mercantile business. If the United States have complete and plenary jurisdiction over the Territory of Alaska, they have the same power to impose a license tax upon individuals carrying on different pursuits as have the States or as has any other sovereignty, and it is an acknowledged point that a State or any sovereignty has the right to impose a license tax upon various occupations. That inheres to the sovereignty of the State.

I take it that the United States has supreme jurisdiction over the Territory of Alaska, and if this regulation of the liquor traffic properly comes in the exercise of its police power, as I think it does, then I believe that the point of unconstitutionality as to procedure, as to whether this bill ought to originate in the Senate or not, is not well taken. I believe that this is the constitutional exercise of a constitutional power which Congress has over the regulation of whatever matter it chooses to regulate in the Territories.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if he thinks the object of the section he has read is to get the money for the Treasury or to regulate the business—which?

Mr. CAFFERY. Perhaps it is an object to get money. Perhaps one of the objects of the proposed act is to get the money. I do not think the fact that one of the purposes of the framers of the bill is to get revenue from it would defeat the power of Congress in the premises. They have power to frame any rule and regulation they see fit, in my opinion, for the proper government of the Territory; and if in the framing of the laws for this purpose they impose license taxes upon persons carrying on business, that does not defeat their power, notwithstanding that the amount of money levied will flow into the United States Treasury. I suppose that one of the purposes of the framers of the amendment is to provide money for the government of the Territory itself, in part; and if so, that would be a legitimate purpose and a legitimate exercise of the power of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do other Senators desire to be heard on the point of order? The Chair is unable to find any precedent in the Senate annals for a decision on such a point of order, but in the Journal of the House of Representatives there is a decision bearing on this question, which the Secretary will read:

The Secretary read as follows:

A motion was made by Mr. Fillmore that the regular order of business be suspended for the present and that the House do proceed to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (No. 72) entitled "An act to authorize an issue of Treasury notes."

And the question being put,

It passed in the affirmative—two-thirds voting therefor.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (No. 72) entitled "An act to authorize an issue of Treasury notes;" and the question recurred on the motion made by Mr. Sprigg on the 25th instant, that the said amendments be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

And, after debate,

The previous question was moved by Mr. Stanly; when

Mr. Roosevelt submitted for the decision of the Chair, as a question of privilege, the following:

"Whereas the amendment made by the Senate to the bill for the issue of Treasury notes, rendering the same an addition to, instead of a partial substitution for, the twelve million loan heretofore authorized by law, converts the said bill into a bill for raising revenue, which, by the Constitution, can only originate in the House of Representatives, and is a breach of the privileges of this House: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the said amendment can not be entertained by this House, and that the bill and amendments be returned to the Senate with a respectful communication to that effect."

The Speaker decided that the point raised was a question of constitutional power between the two Houses of Congress and was not a question of privilege which, in his opinion, it was his duty to submit to the House.

From this decision Mr. Roosevelt took an appeal to the House.

And the question was put, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

And passed in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 73.—House Journal, second session Twenty-seventh Congress, page 287.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question being of such grave import, as suggested by Senators, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate. Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. MANTLE and Mr. CARTER called for a division; and there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 10, no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BATE. No quorum has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That fact will be developed upon a call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. BATE. It has already been developed by the division. Did not the division show it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is correct.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the division shows the want of a quorum, under the rules of the Senate the roll must be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is correct.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the fact to be that, pending a division, and prior to the announcement of the result, the Senator from North Dakota demanded the yeas and nays. Consequently the fact that a quorum was not present was not revealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that the Chair had announced that no quorum had voted.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the call of the Senate. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Faulkner,	McMillan,	Rawlins,
Bacon,	Gallinger,	Mallory,	Shoup,
Bate,	Gear,	Mantle,	Smith,
Berry,	Hanna,	Money,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Hansbrough,	Morrill,	Teller,
Butler,	Harris,	Murphy,	Thurston,
Caffery,	Hawley,	Nelson,	Tillman,
Cannon,	Heitfeld,	Pasco,	Turley,
Carter,	Hoar,	Perkins,	Turner,
Chandler,	Kenney,	Pettigrew,	Walthall,
Chilton,	Kyle,	Pettus,	Warren,
Clay,	McBride,	Platt, Conn.	Wetmore.
Deboe,	McEnery,	Pritchard,
Fairbanks,	McLaurin,	Proctor,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CARTER. In view of the protracted discussion which has obtained, the half hour originally suggested by the Senator from Louisiana having long since passed, I ask that the pending bill may be laid over and that the Senator from Louisiana may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In view of the uncertainty which exists in the minds of many Senators in regard to whether or not the point of order would lie, I will withdraw it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I renew my motion to recommit the bill to the committee whence it came.

Mr. CARTER. Let the bill go over with the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be pursued.

QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2680) amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, when I was discussing the pending bill some time ago, the question was propounded to me by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] whether or not I favored an amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I replied to him that while I was not prepared to say that I would accept the amendment, I thought it was in line with the amendment suggested by a member of the other House, Mr. CATCHINGS, which I had seen, and I then saw no particular objection to it.

I had heard the amendment read, but my hearing is not too acute, and I mistook its terms and scope. After reading the amendment, I am satisfied that it eviscerates this bill and destroys to a large extent existing law in regard to quarantine so far as the Federal authority extends. I could not under any circumstances accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia with my views of the necessity of a uniform and comprehensive system of quarantine.

I introduced a number of documents and papers relating to the subject, but I had not finished when I was last addressing the Senate, and now I send up and ask to have incorporated in my remarks a paper by Dr. H. R. Carter, surgeon of the Marine-Hospital Service, touching the value of the measures of quarantine resorted to by the United States quarantine officials in various epidemics. I also send up another paper by Dr. Carter, in answer to objections to the mandatory pratique of the Federal quarantine. I also send up a letter from Dr. White, in charge of the immigration bureau at Ellis Island, to Dr. Wyman, Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service. I also send up correspondence touching the transfer of the Savannah quarantine station to the Marine-Hospital Service. I ask to have these documents printed in the appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

(The papers referred to will be found in Appendixes F, G, H, and I.)

Mr. WALTHALL. Do these doctors all belong to the Marine-Hospital Service?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir; those I have noted. I will conclude the remarks which I have to make on this subject by a short history of the Marine-Hospital Service and its work.

The Marine-Hospital Service was inaugurated in 1798. It was originally a charitable institution and founded upon the contributions of seamen to a general fund collected by the customs officers of the United States in order to afford a hospital for sick and disabled seamen. That necessarily engendered medical attendance. It is manifest that sailors visiting every port and every clime are apt to contract the diseases of foreign countries, which, being transported into our country, become epidemic, and therefore that the surgeons and medical officers of the Marine-Hospital Service had and have abundant opportunity to acquaint themselves with diseases of foreign origin which are apt to become epidemic when conveyed into the United States.

This Bureau from a small beginning has grown into the proportions of a department of public health. It is properly under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for reasons which I have heretofore adduced. From 2 surgeons, as originally constituted, there are 116 medical officers attached to that Bureau. From a very small number of seamen treated in the beginning there are now about 50,000 seamen treated annually in the marine hospitals of the United States. From a mere medical attention to disabled seamen the scope of the services of the medical officers of the service now embraces the charge of 11 quarantine stations, constituted by statute, the charge of the examination of all officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, of the Life-Saving Service, and the examination, I believe, of a portion of the naval service.

The members of the medical corps of the Marine-Hospital Service undergo a most strict examination. They are graduates of medical colleges of the highest reputation. They come from the Medical College of Maine; Western Reserve Medical College; Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia; Pennsylvania Medical College; Chicago Medical College; Rush Medical College; University of Georgetown, District of Columbia; University of Michigan; Columbian College, Washington, D. C.; Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York; National Medical College, Washington, D. C.; University of Pennsylvania; University of Maryland; College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York; College of Physicians and Surgeons, Baltimore; College of Physicians and Surgeons, Boston; Dartmouth Medical College, New Hampshire; McGill College, Montreal, Canada; Harvard Medical School, Boston; Howard University, Washington, D. C.; Medical College, South Carolina; Virginia Medical College; University of Virginia; Miami Medical School, Cincinnati; Long Island Medical College, New York; St. Louis Medical College.

So it will be seen that the surgeons of the Marine-Hospital Service come from every medical college almost in the United States, and those medical colleges rank among the highest in the United States. Therefore it is to be presumed that the officers are well and abundantly equipped for the service.

Mr. WALTHALL. May I ask the Senator from Louisiana a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. WALTHALL. Are those medical officers required to have any experience in the treatment of contagious diseases, such as yellow fever? Is that a prerequisite?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not know that that is a prerequisite.

Mr. WALTHALL. It is of great importance.

Mr. CAFFERY. But I do know that the most experienced and well-equipped yellow-fever experts in the United States belong to the medical corps of the Marine-Hospital Service. They have to have a first-class medical education to commence with. They are then examined with great care by a corps of medical examiners, and after examination they are admitted as acting surgeons.

Mr. WALTHALL. Did the Senator hear the statement of the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] the other day, that when he went to visit the Ship Island quarantine station as a member of the committee he found that the medical officer in charge there had seen but one case of yellow fever in his life?

Mr. CAFFERY. I have some remembrance of it.

Mr. WALTHALL. It does not comport exactly with the Senator's statement.

Mr. CAFFERY. I beg pardon of the Senator from Mississippi, I think it comports very well with my statement, because it is quite possible that in some locality where yellow fever is not prevalent there may be an officer who has never seen more than one case of yellow fever.

Mr. WALTHALL. That is not such a locality.

Mr. CAFFERY. It is not necessary for an officer to be stationed there who is a yellow-fever expert when there is no yellow fever. I understand this medical corps is an elastic corps.

Mr. WALTHALL. If the Senator will allow me, the officer referred to by the Senator from Florida was a quarantine officer. I should think he ought to know something about yellow fever.

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly. I do not say that the service is absolutely perfect. My knowledge of the service is only gathered from the history of its work, particularly in yellow-fever epidemics, and the success of the efforts of the medical corps both in keeping out yellow fever and other epidemic diseases and in suppressing those diseases after they have gained entrance into a State. It may be that while the physician at the quarantine station at Ship Island had seen but one case of yellow fever he was a considerable expert in the matter of yellow fever. One case is enough.

Mr. MALLORY. He had not seen a case before last summer. That is what I stated.

Mr. WALTHALL. He had not seen any case before last summer, and then only one.

Mr. CAFFERY. That, perhaps, can be accounted for by the fact that he was the resident physician, and when the yellow fever was declared epidemic and became flagrant there were sent to this point experts in yellow fever by this same medical corps.

Mr. WALTHALL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. WALTHALL. Can the Senator tell us whether the Supervising Surgeon-General himself ever saw a single case of yellow fever?

Mr. CAFFERY. I can not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana whether he knows of any reason why, if health matters and quarantine matters pass from the control of the Marine-Hospital Service into the hands of a commission, they will have a larger corps of physicians who have had experience in yellow fever than the Marine-Hospital Service has?

Mr. CAFFERY. None in the world.

Mr. GALLINGER. None in the world. Is it not a fact, I will ask the Senator, that the experts in yellow fever and other infectious diseases, as well as the leading men of the profession, will not be employed either by the Marine-Hospital Service or a commission? They have other work to do that is more important and profitable to them. Is not that a fact?

Mr. CAFFERY. So far as the State health officers are concerned that is true, but there are a number of yellow-fever experts attached to the Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely; and I was about to suggest to the Senator what very likely he has stated. I have not been permitted to listen to this discussion. Is it not a fact that the Marine-Hospital Service have men like Dr. Guiterns, trained in the treatment of yellow fever and other infectious diseases, who are sent to those points when yellow fever exists?

Mr. CAFFERY. Precisely.

Mr. GALLINGER. And under their direction an epidemic is controlled?

Mr. CAFFERY. Precisely. That is substantially what I stated in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Mississippi in that regard—that this service is an elastic one. In my opinion, while it may be necessary at a port where yellow fever is likely to come in to have stationed there permanently a yellow-fever expert, yet if yellow fever is not prevalent and the physician at the quarantine station is perfectly competent to disinfect ships and kill the germs, there may not be an immediate necessity for an expert; but the very moment yellow fever is declared the Medical Corps of the Marine-Hospital Service has at command the best experts in the United States, and they are immediately sent to the scene of danger.

They commence their disinfection process; they stamp out the disease; and it is perfectly easy for the resident physicians, by a species of disinfection which is now applied to all incoming ships from yellow-fever or other infectious districts, to stamp out this disease, and it is only when it appears that it is necessary to have the presence of experts.

I was going on to state generally the equipment of this medical corps. I stated the practice of colleges represented in the medical corps by graduates of those colleges now in that corps, and I will now state some of the work that this corps has done in yellow fever.

The Marine-Hospital Service took charge and control of the epidemic of yellow fever in Brunswick, Ga., in 1893. They took charge and control of the yellow-fever epidemic in Texas in 1882 and in Florida in 1888. They have taken charge of the smallpox wherever it has appeared upon the border of the United States and Canada and in other places. They have succeeded in a most wonderful degree preventing the introduction of cholera into the United States.

Mr. President, let me read a statement in regard to the success of the applications of the Marine-Hospital Service physicians as to preventing cholera from being introduced into the United States. I read from a statement I have already placed in the RECORD:

After cholera had been declared epidemic in Naples, three vessels left for the United States—the Masilia, Weser, and Cashmere—and all were made to conform to the regulations. They all arrived at the port of New York with no cholera en route or at time of arrival. During the same period four vessels with the same class of passengers and their places of origin similar, in many cases identical, the water and food supply being the same as on the vessels for the United States, left for South America, and all were turned back by the South American authorities and returned to Naples. One, the Vincenzia Floria, had about 50 deaths; the Andrea Gloria, 90 on the way out—total not ascertained; another 84 deaths, and the fourth, 230 deaths from cholera.

Here were seven vessels leaving Naples, three for the United States and four for South American ports. Under the disinfection process adopted and applied by the medical corps of the Marine-Hospital Service, those vessels which cleared for the United States were disinfected and the cholera germ destroyed. They arrived in the city of New York and not one single death occurred from cholera. The other four, due for places in South America, which were not subjected to the treatment the three were that entered the port of New York, coming from the same place, with the same kind of passengers, with the same supply of food and water, suffered to the extent of 238 deaths. There, sir, in that one single instance is conclusive proof of the necessity of a maritime quarantine.

I have argued, and I argue still, that the same power which has jurisdiction over maritime quarantine ought to have power over interstate quarantine, because of the necessity of quick and concerted action, because of the greater ability of the United States medical corps to treat these diseases, which from the nature of their occupation they are familiar with, and because of the abundance of means which the United States can supply and does supply.

Mr. President, there are eleven United States quarantine stations. They are at the Delaware Breakwater; Reedy Island, Delaware River; Cape Charles, Virginia; Blackbeard Island, Sapelo Sound, Georgia; Brunswick, Ga.; Dry Tortugas, Florida; Ship Island, Gulf of Mexico; San Diego, Cal.; Angel Island, San Francisco Bay, California; Port Townsend, Wash.; Cape Fear Quarantine, Southport, N. C.

Besides, under the law as it now exists this medical corps is represented at every consular port in foreign countries where contagious diseases that visit the United States originate—cholera, yellow fever, bubonic plague, and such diseases. It is their province and duty to make a complete study of these diseases, so that ships from those countries may be subjected to the proper scientific treatment and made so free of disease that they can enter the ports of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I have been for some days discussing this question, having been delayed by the memorial services which have taken place in this body in honor of the memory of the late Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Earle, and a late member of the House, Mr. Simpkins. This subject is one of great moment to the whole United States. I have no pride of opinion as to the best means of preventing yellow fever, or as to the best branch to execute any law that Congress in its wisdom sees fit to adopt. My whole purpose, my whole desire, is to relieve the country from these dreadful visitations and to place the United States upon a basis where some kind of intercourse between its citizens may be had safe and secure during the prevalence of these fearful visitations.

APPENDIX A.

EXTRACT FROM THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE, DECEMBER 6, 1897.

The recent prevalence of yellow fever in a number of cities and towns throughout the South has resulted in much disturbance of commerce and demonstrated the necessity of such amendments to our quarantine laws as will make the regulations of the national quarantine authorities paramount. The Secretary of the Treasury, in the portion of his report relating to the operation of the Marine-Hospital Service, calls attention to the defects in the present quarantine laws and recommends amendments thereto which will give the Treasury Department the requisite authority to prevent the invasion of epidemic diseases from foreign countries, and in times of emergency, like that of the past summer, will add to the efficiency of the sanitary measures for the protection of the people and at the same time prevent unnecessary restriction of commerce. I concur in his recommendation.

EXTRACT FROM ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY FOR THE YEAR 1897.

NATIONAL QUARANTINE LAW.

The Surgeon-General reports the necessity for a strictly national quarantine law, to which attention has been called in previous reports. In his report for 1896 there were shown the unequal benefits and at the same time the danger involved in the operations of the present quarantine law, that of February 15, 1893, which permits State and local quarantines to be conducted under their own rules and regulations, provided, in the opinion of the Secretary, additional rules and regulations are not required. The Surgeon-General maintains that the national quarantine regulations should be made paramount. He states that under the provision of the law which requires him to aid in the execution and enforcement of State and local quarantine regulations claim has frequently been made by local authorities that this is the chief intent of the law, and that, however absurd and unnecessary local quarantine regulations may be, the Marine-Hospital Service is bound to aid in the enforcement of them.

He recommends that the law of 1893 be amended so that its effect shall be to make national quarantine regulations paramount and to prevent interference with their enforcement by any State or local legislation. This feature of the law should apply to both maritime and interstate quarantine. Its necessity with regard to maritime quarantine has been amply demonstrated, as shown in previous annual reports. With regard to interstate quarantine, its necessity has been forcibly revealed during the recent epidemic of yellow fever in the South, when local quarantine authorities placed restrictions which not only paralyzed commerce, but prevented the exercise of their full duties by the officers of the Government in their efforts to prevent the disease spreading from one section to another. It is suggested that the law should be so framed that it will be within the province of the Secretary of the Treasury promptly to establish a quarantine station without regard to the State or local quarantine at whatever points and at any time that he may deem it necessary for the public safety to take such action.

RESOLUTIONS OF LEGISLATURES, BOARDS OF TRADE, MEDICAL ASSOCIATIONS, ETC.

The New York Chamber of Commerce in 1871 passed the following resolution:

"That the committee on foreign commerce be instructed to prepare a memorial to Congress asking such legislation of that body as shall serve to place the subject of quarantine and immigration under the charge of the General Government."

Pensacola (Fla.) Chamber of Commerce, October 11, 1894, passed the following:

"Resolved, That the time has arrived when the future growth of Pensacola as a shipping port demands the free entry of all shipping under the supervision of the United States Marine-Hospital Service."

Report of the special committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York on quarantine at the port of New York during the cholera of 1892:

"Resolved, That the chamber of commerce memorialize the President and the Congress of the United States to enact as speedily as may be a suitable law placing the control of quarantine at New York and at all other places under national control.

"Resolved, That the attention of Congress is respectfully directed to the injurious influences that continued indiscriminate immigration may have upon the welfare of this country, in the hope that careful investigation relative thereto may be promptly had.

* * * * * * *

"All of which is respectfully submitted.

"ALEXANDER E. ORR,
"SETH LOW,
"SAMUEL D. BABCOCK,
"J. PIERPONT MORGAN,
"Special Committee.

"NEW YORK, December 13, 1892."

Report of the New York Board of Trade on national quarantine, dated January 6, 1896, the conclusion of which is as follows:

"The conclusion of your committee, therefore, is that it is essential to the safety of our people and the protection of their lives that a national quarantine system be established in the United States at the earliest possible day. We believe that to be effective the system adopted must be national, and that any systems maintained at ports of entry under State or local control should not be allowed to conflict or hinder the national system."

Resolutions by the physicians of the State of Illinois on national control of quarantine:

"We therefore come to you as medical men simply to express most earnestly our convictions that whatever form your legislative action may assume, its outcome should be the establishment at once of a complete quarantine system, without reserve, under national control, paramount to all local systems and as comprehensive in its scope and power as constitutional limitations will permit."

Resolutions of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange:

"PHILADELPHIA, December 31, 1892.

"At an adjourned meeting of the board of directors of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, held this day, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas a circular dated December 21, 1892, was mailed to each member of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, also to about 3,700 prominent business men and organizations of the city of Philadelphia, asking what system of quarantine they favored; and

"Whereas the replies received are almost unanimous in favor of a national quarantine: Be it, and it is hereby,

"Resolved, That the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange earnestly advocates the immediate passage by Congress of a law establishing Federal quarantine throughout the United States on the lines laid down by the Secretary of the Treasury in his recent annual report, believing that such a law would insure a uniform, modern, and scientific quarantine throughout the whole country, and give maximum protection, with no unnecessary restrictions upon commerce, and at the lowest cost; it is further

"Resolved, That both Houses of Congress be petitioned to pass such a law, and to pass it at once, so that the Marine-Hospital

Service within the next four months may be enabled to complete all necessary preparations for keeping out cholera; it is further

"Resolved, That the Philadelphia Congressional delegation be urged to use every effort to have such a law passed at once; it is further

"Resolved, That the Board of Trade, the Commercial Exchange, the Manufacturers' Club, the Trades League, and the Vessel Owners and Captains' Association, all of Philadelphia, and the maritime exchanges or associations of New York, Boston, and Baltimore be asked to cooperate in obtaining the legislation referred to; and it is further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, the governor of the State of Pennsylvania, the State board of health of Pennsylvania, the Philadelphia board of health, and to the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York."

Resolutions of the Tri-State Medical Association of Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia, October, 1897:

"Resolved, That the recent outbreak of yellow fever in the South, and the numerous conflicting State and municipal quarantine regulations emphasize the great need of national quarantine laws which are uniform and protective.

"Resolved, That the Tri-State Medical Association, in convention assembled, hereby urges upon Congress the necessity of national quarantine laws which shall give exclusive charge of quarantine to the United States Marine-Hospital Service in connection with the development of cholera, yellow fever, smallpox, and plague."

The American Medical Association, in June, 1873, appointed a committee to urge on Congress the passage of an act for a national quarantine.

The quarantine convention in Jacksonville, February, 1878, adopted a report asking that a uniform and efficient system of quarantine should be adopted and administered by the National Government.

Resolutions adopted by the board of health, Mobile, Ala., October 9, 1873:

"Resolved, Inasmuch as no quarantine measures of our seaports can be effective against the importation of disease without uniformity in time and method, that Congress be memorialized to establish a uniform system of quarantine under national supervision."

Resolutions of the Georgia legislature, 1897:

"Whereas the present epidemic of yellow fever in the South has demonstrated that the local authorities are insufficient to prevent the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, principally because of want of uniform regulations governing health affairs; and

"Whereas the health regulations now in force, viz, State, municipal, and county, each dependent on the other, and one frequently conflicting with another, have proven disastrous to travel, State and interstate commerce, and business generally; and

"Whereas it is desirable in the interest of the public health and State and interstate commerce to provide for a more uniform system of quarantine; and

"Whereas the regulations of the United States Marine-Hospital Service are framed with due regard to local and climatic conditions: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Georgia, That hereafter in case of an outbreak of yellow fever, cholera, smallpox, or plague, all quarantine matters in the State of Georgia shall be turned over to the United States Marine-Hospital Service during the continuance of such epidemic, under appropriate legislation to be hereafter enacted by Congress, enlarging the powers of the United States Marine-Hospital Service granted under the act of Congress approved February 15, 1893.

"Resolved further, That pending such additional legislation by Congress all certificates of freedom from danger of conveying infection from persons, localities, baggage, freight, and vehicles, for the transportation of passengers and freight duly signed by medical officers of the Marine-Hospital Service shall be accepted by the State and local authorities in the State of Georgia.

"Resolved further, That we respectfully memorialize Congress to enact the necessary legislation to effectuate this resolution.

"Resolved further, That we request our Senators and Representatives to use all proper means to have such legislation adopted.

"Resolved, That the Surgeon-General of the United States Marine-Hospital Service be furnished with a copy of this resolution."

LETTER OF GEORGE C. SMITH, PRESIDENT OF THE ATLANTA AND WEST POINT RAILROAD, TO GOVERNOR R. B. BULLOCK.

ATLANTA, GA., October 25, 1897.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to our recent conversation, I beg to hand you the following statement:

The present visitation of yellow fever in the South has brought about a condition of affairs which, I believe, is worthy of the serious consideration of all thoughtful people.

Never before in the history of epidemics in this country has the power of quarantine been exercised in such an arbitrary and disastrous manner.

Yellow fever was announced in New Orleans, Ocean Springs, Biloxi, Mobile, and other places in Louisiana and Alabama early in the month of September, 1897. The effect of this announcement was to bring into action several distinct quarantines, acting concurrently under assumed legal authority. The boards of health of various cities immediately prohibited all passenger trains running from or through infected points from stopping within the corporate limits of such places and placed their inspectors upon all trains arriving and departing on the direct line of travel to and from infected points. Municipal restrictions were also placed in effect preventing not only the receipt of freight from infected points, but the through passage of such freight, as well as the receipt of through passage of empty equipment.

Simultaneously the boards of health of several States adopted restrictions against both passengers and freight entering such States from infected points or the return of equipment into such States which had been in infected places. The State also placed its own inspectors upon the trains of railway companies forming direct lines to and from the infected districts. The rules of the State and city quarantines were materially different in many particulars, causing great confusion in the adaptation of the transportation service in their varying requirements.

Unusual and arbitrary rules were promulgated by State boards of health, prohibiting even the transportation of flat cars, coal cars, or ore cars without fumigation. Places like the city of Atlanta, Ga., which had been proven by long experience exempt from yellow fever, were subjected to quarantine restrictions, preventing the movement of both passengers and traffic.

With the utmost difficulty modifications of such quarantine restrictions were obtained after several weeks' negotiation with State and municipal authorities, although but one single yellow-fever case existed in the city of Atlanta, and that a refugee.

Varying periods of residence in uninfected localities were required by different States and cities before persons who had been in infected places were allowed to enter quarantined territory, causing great confusion and frequent detention to passenger traffic. Shotgun quarantines were established in many localities, preventing the movement of either freight or passenger trains through large sections of the country. The alarm was so great in the State of Alabama that the State board of health prohibited the citizens of that State from obtaining refuge at any place within its limits. All citizens of Alabama from infected places were, therefore, obliged to seek an asylum beyond the boundaries of their own State, although many places within their State were willing to receive them.

In addition to municipal, county, and State quarantines and the numerous shotgun regulations prevailing in country communities, the United States Marine-Hospital Service established a supervisory control over the movement of passengers and baggage to and from infected districts. Inspectors of the United States Marine-Hospital Service were placed upon all trains and assumed charge of the fumigation of all baggage and personal effects of passengers. It is proper to say, the operation of the United States Marine-Hospital Service has been systematically and intelligently conducted under the supervision of experienced physicians familiar with the standard requirements for the suppression and spread of yellow fever, and its methods have been in marked contrast with the State, city, and county regulations.

The multiplicity of officers, inspectors, rules, regulations, and orders which have been emitted by the numerous boards, governors, and health officers have tended to greatly confuse and embarrass the efforts made by the transportation lines to conduct business in a systematic and orderly manner.

All railway companies reaching the infected districts have made continuous and well-directed efforts to meet the sudden and pressing demands for transportation and to comply with all requirements of the various authorities which have assumed jurisdiction over them, whether legally constituted or not. The entire commercial system of many States in the South has been thrown into a chaotic condition, largely attributable to the want of a uniform, intelligent, and authoritative supervision over quarantine regulations.

The spread of the disease from one city to another until a half dozen States have become infected is undoubtedly due to the lack of an effective and intelligent administration of quarantine regulations. The control of the entire subject of quarantine by the United States authorities would, in my judgment, accomplish the following results:

First. Prevent the spread of contagious diseases like yellow fever from the original point of infection.

Second. Provide uniform and scientific methods of quarantine where many foci of infection have to be dealt with.

Third. Prevent unnecessary and disastrous interruptions to the commerce of the country by providing reasonable, intelligent, and effective supervision over transportation lines.

I trust the foregoing will give you some information of value on the subject referred to.

Yours, very truly,

GEO. C. SMITH,
President and General Manager.

Governor R. B. BULLOCK, Atlanta, Ga.

LETTER OF EX-GOVERNOR RUFUS B. BULLOCK TO THE PRESIDENT.

ENGLISH-AMERICAN LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY,
Atlanta, Ga., October 27, 1897.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The diversified and irregular enforcement of quarantines by towns, counties, and States is a serious and dangerous hindrance to commercial and individual travel. The necessity for uniform action under Federal authority is so apparent as to make any argument superfluous.

My object in writing is to ask, Mr. President, that you call the attention of Congress to this subject in a line of your coming message. I can safely assure you of the support of our leading Southern journals for any proper legislation taking national control of this most vitally important subject.

Your attention is invited to the communication of President Smith on this subject, inclosed.

Very respectfully,

RUFUS B. BULLOCK.

The President of the United States, WM. MCKINLEY,
Washington, D. C.

FROM THE STATE BOARD OF HEALTH OF MICHIGAN.

In illustration of the interest which the interior States have in maritime quarantine and their desire for a strictly national system and as demonstrating that the expenses of quarantine should be met by the whole people rather than by vessels entering the several ports, I insert here the following communication from the board of health of Michigan, a copy of which was forwarded to the Marine-Hospital Bureau:

STATE BOARD OF HEALTH,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Lansing, March 18, 1896.

To the honorable the Senators and Congressmen from Michigan, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We, the officers of the Michigan State board of health, having in mind especially the protection of the citizens of Michigan from danger of contracting communicable diseases from immigrants and immigrants' baggage passing through the port at Portland, Me., to which port many immigrants bound for Michigan and beyond sometimes come, especially in winter, when the St. Lawrence River is not navigable, and understanding that it is the desire of the local and of the State health authorities of Maine that a national quarantine station be established at the port of Portland, Me., do most respectfully urge the honorable the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Michigan to use their influence to bring about this desired improvement.

We believe that a frequently changing municipal government, with its varying ideas of the expediency of making expenditures which are more largely for the protection of citizens of other parts of this country than of the citizens of Maine, is not equal to the task of the continuous maintenance of a quarantine station which shall meet the requirements for safety to the health of our people.

We believe that the interests of the whole country would be much better served if there were at Portland, Me., a quarantine station under the control of the National Government.

Again expressing a desire that you use your influence in bringing about this desired change, we remain,

Very respectfully,

FRANK WELLS, President.
HENRY B. BAKER, Secretary.

APPENDIX B.

EXTRACTS FROM DAILY PRESS.

ALABAMA.

[Montgomery Advertiser, December 5, 1897.]

The report of the Birmingham Commercial Club showed communications from a number of trades bodies in the South and North, including those in Nashville, Chattanooga, and Philadelphia, heartily indorsing the project of national quarantine.

[Mobile Daily Herald, January 27, 1898.]

This matter of quarantine is too serious a one to be made subservient to theories or prejudices. We must have adequate protection from yellow fever this summer, and there must be Congressional action. We can see no reason why Congress should not pass the Caffery quarantine bill as amended in the Senate.

[Mobile Sunday Item, January 2, 1898.]

The shotgun quarantines and the jarring and conflicting regulations of towns, counties, and States are what Governor Johnston properly named them—intolerable. They killed trade, progress, production, personal liberty, and interstate commerce at one fell swoop.

CALIFORNIA.

[San Francisco Daily Report, November 3, 1897.]

It is this very disregard of local conditions that makes the national quarantine service better than the State service. The officers may be no better, though their long special experience should make them so; but they are far more independent. Their positions and livelihood do not depend on the maintenance of friendly relations with those affected by the quarantine rules, and they can act regardless of all personal considerations. The State official's term is short, and, like other State officials, he may feel that he must make hay while the sun shines. Hence he is always more likely to be improperly influenced than is the Federal official.

[San Francisco Daily Report, January 1, 1898.]

In two or three Southern States where the danger of disease importation is greatest the local authorities are delighted to have Federal officers take charge of their quarantines, not only because they are thus relieved of considerable expense and responsibility, but because they know how the United States quarantine can be depended upon. One thing that goes to make the Federal quarantine especially efficient is that the United States has agents at foreign ports whose business it is to transmit to the home Government—by telegraph if necessary—news of the sanitary condition of the ports at which they are respectively stationed. This is an advantage the State quarantine officers do not possess. There is no earthly need of the State quarantine service.

[San Francisco Argonaut, October 20, 1897.]

It is estimated that the loss of business even at Mobile has already amounted to $4,000,000 and that at New Orleans to $25,000,000, as the cotton freight business has been completely stopped. After this new invasion of the yellow plague shall have been checked, we are of the opinion that the Southern States, and we hope all the States of the Union, will be content to place quarantine in the hands of the Federal Government, where it belongs.

CONNECTICUT.

[Bridgeport Standard, October 19, 1897.]

The need of general quarantine regulations, uniform everywhere and impartially applied, is all the more evident as time passes on, and the people of all the South must see the need and advantage of such an arrangement.

[New Haven Evening Leader, January 3, 1898.]

This subject is of paramount interest to the people of the United States, for nothing enters deeper into the daily and business life of the people and the safety and welfare of the country than the question of protection from epidemic diseases. It is, however, not a question of persons or places or power.

It is a question of reasonable and logical methods of the General Government, dealing with one of the phases of maritime trade and commerce, a function which it exercises by the Constitution. It seems to us that there can be but one view which reasonable people will take of this question, and that is one which looks to the General Government as the powerful and uniform conservator of the public health. The bill of Representative HEPBURN, of Iowa, practically identical with that of Senator CAFFERY, confers the necessary power to deal with these epidemics. This measure should pass.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

[Washington Star, October 6, 1897.]

In an emergency like an outbreak of a deadly fever there is no time for disputes between medical officers, governors, sheriffs, and other public servants. Jealousies are almost sure to arise if they are not prevented by wise efforts by some central authority with power and discretion to act freely. The Government has assumed charge of the interstate features of the transportation system of the country, and its action has resulted in better conditions generally. It can as well and much more profitably be given charge of the interstate features of the public health, for whenever an epidemic occurs or threatens, the smallest detail of the management of the protective work in one State has a most intimate relation to the health of all residents of all neighboring States.

[Washington Star, October 29, 1897.]

The futility and danger of the quarantine methods employed by the Gulf States and surrounding communities during times of disease contagion have been amply demonstrated during the past season of prevalence of yellow fever throughout a large area in that vicinity.

[Washington Post, September 20, 1897.]

The General Government should take charge—absolute charge—of quarantine regulations, or it should withdraw finally from the field. We should have one harmonious and uniform system, or we should surrender the yellow-fever belt to chaos and to barbarism. These conflicts of authority, these jealousies, resentments, and animosities only complicate the difficulties of the situation. In the name of civilization and humanity, Congress ought to take hold of the question next winter and give us some intelligent and conclusive legislation in the premises.

[Washington Post, January 10, 1898.]

We trust that Congress will give us a national, absolute, and uniform system of quarantine.

FLORIDA.

[Pensacola Daily News, January 11, 1893.]

A national system would correct the panicky quarantine of the States and interior towns against the seaboard cities which has often operated to the great loss of the latter; would greatly lessen the present imposts on commerce. The expenses would not be borne by the vessels, but by the whole country, which is but just and right. The National Government should protect us against disease as against any other invasion.

[Pensacola Daily News, October 5, 1894.]

One of the principal reasons why the control of all quarantine affairs should be relegated to the Federal authorities is found in the constant conflict between different local boards.

GEORGIA.

[Atlanta Journal, December 16, 1897.]

Atlanta does want. So does all Georgia, and so do the press and people of all of the Southern States with almost unanimity. True, a few captious papers along the Gulf littoral have persistently whined against the adoption by Congress of any action looking to national supervision of a matter which gravely affects the business of the whole nation. But, as the Journal has shown from the beginning, this opposition, when not based on small local interests, is the result of hidebound adherence to effete ideas or to small personal prejudice.

[Atlanta Journal, January 31, 1897.]

Georgia was untouched by the yellow fever last summer, but she did suffer from the clumsy and ineffective quarantine methods which were adopted in neighboring States. Very few of those citizens of Georgia who had good opportunities to observe how State and local quarantine regulations worked then will be found now to oppose the movement for a national quarantine law. The fear of Federal interference with State rights will not deter them from advocating scientific, just, and uniform quarantine regulations, and there seems to be no way to secure these so long as every bailiwick is permitted to remain a quarantine law unto itself.

[Atlanta Journal, December 8, 1897.]

The local quarantine regulations of the States and cities recently afflicted with yellow fever proved not only ineffective but ridiculous.

[Atlanta Journal, November 10, 1897.]

To prevent the spread of epidemics, as well as to prevent unreasonable attacks upon business and interference with the rights of the public without just cause, the proposed enlargement of the powers of the Marine-Hospital Service should by all means be accomplished.

[Savannah Morning News, October 10, 1897.]

The whole matter of quarantine should be in the hands of one authority—an authority having the means and the power to act in accordance with the actual demands of the situation. That authority is the General Government.

[Atlanta Constitution, October 9, 1897.]

As matters now stand, the commercial interests of the South are wholly at the mercy of ridiculous and unwarranted measures, and scarcely a day passes without giving rise to some development which grievously emphasizes the need of centralized and uniform regulations.

[Macon Telegraph, October 24, 1897.]

No State government is strong enough to deal with him [Yellow Jack—i. e., yellow fever] adequately, and the expense of the task should be put upon the National Government, for one case of the imported plague on the Gulf coast injures business in New York and Seattle. We must turn the whole matter of handling Yellow Jack over to the Federal Government. It is the only way to do.

[Macon Telegraph, January 28, 1898.]

Those who have been insisting that the rights of the State would be invaded by Federal intervention should now sing small. The question is not an issue at all. Here in Georgia we can not trust to Mississippi methods, for that State has little money to spend for anything, and we have had enough of the risk of accommodating refugees. Georgia has no voice in the Mississippi legislature, but she does have a considerable voice in the National Congress. We can be protected from neglect in Mississippi only by the Federal Government. As we have said repeatedly, yellow fever is a foreign foe, and can be dealt with successfully only through uniform Federal laws.

LOUISIANA.

[New Orleans Daily Picayune, January 19, 1898.]

All arbitrary and lawless interference with interstate and transcontinental trade will be prevented, but no proper and substantial right of States or people will be interfered with. This sort of sanitation is proper and practicable, and no valid objection can be made to it. There could be no better arrangement than to place the administration of a proper national health service under the Marine-Hospital management. That body is entirely out of politics and can have no interest to raise unnecessary alarms or to discriminate in its operations against sections or localities.

[New Orleans Picayune, October 8, 1897.]

The people of the United States seem to be drifting rapidly toward nationalism. The Marine-Hospital Service, the Army and Navy medical departments, are permanent institutions. They do not go in and out with every change of the National Administration, and some fair and unpartisan treatment could be expected from either of them if they were intrusted with the control of quarantine. But a department of public health, whose political complexion would change at every Presidential election, would be a mere political machine, through whose operation the South would be sure to suffer.

[New Orleans Picayune, November 7, 1897.]

The people who stop trains under the pretense of quarantines are violating the law as much as do those who hold up trains for the purposes of robbery. To bar the progress of an interstate carrier and to prevent the transportation of passengers, mails, and merchandise to the persons to whom they belong is in effect robbery, no matter what may be the pretense upon which such acts are perpetrated.

[New Orleans Times-Democrat, January 19, 1898.]

The Caffery bill places the Federal quarantine in the hands of the United States Marine-Hospital Service and greatly increases the powers and responsibilities of the Federal Government in the matter of the protection of this country from the invasion of disease from abroad. The Southern people, after last year's experience, are thoroughly willing to extend the Federal power in that direction, and see no danger to the States from doing so. They are therefore willing and, indeed, desirous that the marine quarantine shall be placed under Federal control, so that it may be uniform for the entire country.

[New Orleans Times-Democrat, January 23, 1898.]

We want some quarantine system that will assure us the best protection against the invasion of disease.

[New Orleans Times-Democrat, December 12, 1897.]

We in Louisiana have a perfectly efficient system of maritime quarantine; but we saw a few months ago of how little account the possession and maintenance of that efficient system were when disease could invade neighboring States, owing to their inefficient quarantine, and could then be passed on to us. Therefore it was we contended that quarantine should be taken from the State authorities and put in the hands of the Federal power, which alone could systematize the differing and frequently conflicting quarantines, make them uniform, and enforce them.

MARYLAND.

[Baltimore American, November 24, 1897.]

The Government should have absolute control of all quarantines. Had this been the case in the South, the disease would doubtless have been confined within a narrower compass, and more valuable information would now be at the disposal of the professions for use in future epidemics.

MASSACHUSETTS.

[Springfield Union, October 14, 1897.]

The national officials should be given full authority, and State and local boards of health and officials should be compelled to subordinate themselves to them. The only way to make such attempts to prevent widespread suffering and serious embarrassment to trade and commerce is to avoid the divided responsibility that comes from State quarantine control, and by centralization of responsibility in the Federal health officers.

[Boston Traveler, October 14, 1897.]

There should be a national law strong enough to reconcile all the differences between the various authorities. Uniformity of sanitary regulations can not but prove beneficial to the country as a whole, and the intermittent flurry for safety when a contagious disease breaks out will be done away with.

MISSISSIPPI.

[Biloxi Herald, October 16, 1897.]

Congress will fail in the discharge of one of the most sacred duties which it has ever been called upon to perform if it does not at its next session pass a law conferring the necessary authority and carrying a sufficient appropriation to insure its efficient exercise.

[Gulfport Southward, January 14, 1898.]

Cholera, yellow fever, typhus fever, and bubonic plague are practically the only diseases which quarantine stations pretend to keep out, and these diseases, taken together, have not caused an average of 1,000 deaths per year in the United States for the past twenty years. On the other hand, three diseases alone, viz, tuberculosis, typhoid fever, and diphtheria, destroy 157,000 lives annually.

NEW YORK.

[New York Commercial Advertiser, February 19, 1898.]

Shotguns or Uncle Sam?

Necessity of national quarantine both for protection of commerce and for public health begins to be recognized, especially at the South. The control by city and State health officers of international commerce and travel in quarantine matters, while the same interests are supervised by national authority in customs and immigration matters, is a great anomaly. There is really no middle course between shotgun quarantine and national quarantine.

[New York Herald, February 12, 1898.]

National quarantine and the Marine-Hospital Service.

With the experiences of the late epidemic of yellow fever in fresh recollection, the necessity for a national system of quarantine can hardly be questioned. While the friends of the various measures are consistently working in the direction of a comprehensive form of national quarantine, it is quite evident that the odds are in favor of developing a system we have already at hand rather than institute new ones, however comprehensive and efficient they may promise to be. The Caffery bill offers seemingly the best solution of these difficulties. The public has every confidence in the ability of the Marine-Hospital Service and every hope in the amplification of its resources.

[New York Herald, January 11, 1898.]

The people of the United States demand a national quarantine.

[New York Commercial America, February 8, 1898.]

The objection to the local municipal quarantines is that they are necessarily conflicting, irregular, and variable, and this to such an extent that with the best intentions and the utmost care it is all but impossible for a railroad to be operated in conformance with such regulations; and those regulations are most disagreeable and oppressive to passengers. Moreover, these local municipal quarantines are of doubtful legality, and it is questionable whether the railroad companies may not hereafter be asked to pay damages on account of delay to freight and passengers by reason of complying therewith.

[New York Tribune, October 23, 1897.]

State and Federal quarantines.

The continued spread of yellow fever through the Gulf States seems to argue more and more forcibly the breakdown of that haphazard system of local quarantine on which the South has depended for years past, and still depends, to bar the progress of infectious diseases. That a well-organized and liberally-equipped Federal service would close most of the gaps through which the epidemics of the past have found an entrance to our ports will not be disputed.

[New York Journal of Commerce, October 14, 1897.]

Every community that is threatened with yellow fever is entitled to sympathy and aid in its self-defense, but it should be compelled to limit its defense to modern and scientific means and to inflict the minimum losses upon trade instead of instantly resorting to the methods that seemed reasonable when the black death ravaged Europe five centuries ago.

[New York Mail and Express, October 20, 1897.]

The need of uniformity in quarantine regulations is imperative. The old, conflicting State systems are grossly inadequate to prevent the advance of epidemic disease, and besides that they often actually expose whole neighborhoods to the danger of infection. Senator CAFFERY'S struggle in getting through the various lines of State quarantine now guarding the yellow fever districts in the Southwest is but an example of thousands of instances that happen whenever such diseases make their appearance.

State and local regulations will never provide the efficient safeguards which can be gained from a national quarantine system, and it is therefore particularly gratifying to learn that Mr. CAFFERY is already at work on the draft of such a measure for submission to Congress at the approaching session. His recent experience abundantly qualifies him to explain the necessity for such legislation.

[New York Mail and Express, December 10, 1897.]

Senator CAFFERY'S promptness in proposing this urgent measure of public safety is actuated by the soundest considerations of prudence and patriotism. It is almost inconceivable that there should be any respectable opposition to an act so indispensable to national interests.

[Albany Press and Knickerbocker, October 19, 1897.]

The need of a strong Federal quarantine system in the Gulf States is at this time the subject of earnest discussion by the newspapers of the region now exposed to yellow-fever visitation. That region in some seasons when conditions are favorable for the spread of the disease may infect other districts. The weak links in our chain of defenses against this destroyer are danger points for the country. This danger is in an extremely important sense a national peril, and preventives should be administered on a national basis.

PENNSYLVANIA.

[Philadelphia Record, January 24, 1898.]

The whole matter should be placed in the hands of the Federal authorities, where it properly belongs. There has been quite enough toleration of chaotic management and shotgun quarantine. Epidemics of cholera and yellow fever ought to be made impossible in this country, and they would become so if we could have a national quarantine law which should provide ample resources and give proper authority for restricting and controlling them.

[Philadelphia Press, January 21, 1898.]

As a rule, the Southerners, who are accustomed to the Marine-Hospital Service, as they are in the habit of calling it to their aid in yellow-fever and smallpox emergencies, owing to local ignorance, favor the extension of the Marine-Hospital Service. This is also the plan of such experts as our own Dr. Guiteras, who believe the development of the service as a national health bureau is practicable and easy of accomplishment. This is the situation, and the Caffery bill meets it through the granting of additional powers to the Hospital Service which are drastic enough in times of emergency to meet all cases and yet will permit local authorities at other times to get along with the cooperation or mere advice of the service, and without surrendering their identity or organization.

[Philadelphia Public Ledger, October 6, 1897.]

The need of a strong Federal quarantine system in the Gulf States is at this time the subject of earnest discussion by the newspapers of the region now exposed to yellow-fever visitation. Weak links in our chain of defenses against this destroyer are danger points to the country. This danger is in an extremely important sense a national peril, and preventives should be administered on a national basis.

[Philadelphia Evening Telegraph, October 16, 1897.

Experience has demonstrated that these local quarantines do not afford effective protection even at home, while as to localities beyond their purview they are of course utterly useless. Epidemics do not move with reference to State boundaries, and a thoroughgoing quarantine established in one State is of no avail if disease is allowed to come in next door on the other side of an imaginary line. In view of these known facts, persistent and consistent efforts have been made to establish a national quarantine system extending not only to all coasts of the country, but all over the interior as well. These efforts have been constantly thwarted by the obstinate opposition of the Southern people, inspired by their State rights sentiments. The national quarantine authorities, in deference to these sentiments, have been cribbed, cabined, and confined on every side by legal restrictions, and are to this day forbidden to take any action whatever, no matter how necessary, except by and with the advice and consent of hostile State officials.

[Philadelphia North-American, October 8, 1897.]

The objection to a uniform system of quarantine to be established by Congress and administered by the Federal authorities seems to root in the insane jealousy of State rights. The establishment of national quarantine would not interfere with the function of the local boards of health in any way, but the Federal authorities would find the local boards great helpers in such emergencies as that now presented in the Gulf States.

[Pittsburg Press, November 21, 1897.]

The idea is antagonized, but it is significantly observed that the most serious objection to Federal regulation is made in those parts of the South which were exempt from the late visitation of yellow fever.

[Erie Graphic, November 21, 1897.]

The outbreak of yellow fever in the Southern States this year, the complete failure of local control of quarantine, and the needless embargoes placed on business in those districts that escaped the disease have stirred up the movement in favor of what is called a national quarantine law.

[Easton Express, October 14, 1897.]

There is only one rational conclusion to be drawn from this year's experiences of the yellow fever, and that is that Congress should, at its next session, enact a law providing for a national system of quarantine.

[Scranton Truth, October 23, 1897.]

Congress ought to take up and place on the same footing national defense against invasion by war and invasion by pestilence. We have had occasion to say this before. The present yellow fever visitation furnishes occasion to repeat it.

TENNESSEE.

[Memphis Scimetar, February 8, 1898.]

The patchwork system of State and municipal quarantines is a most costly example of local inability to deal with a problem that is essentially national.

[Chattanooga News, October 21, 1897.]

Sure relief can only come from the National Government. If the task is left to a dozen different State governments, a repetition of the present unfortunate state of affairs is always to be feared. The temptation is ever present to popularize a port by relaxing the rigidity of the inspection of shipping which is to land there.

Our commercial bodies, even the foremost movers in matters of general concern, will do well to begin an agitation which shall secure effective legislation for our protection from the approaching session of Congress.

[Chattanooga Times, October 19, 1897.]

As to the power of the General Government to protect the country from invasion by disease, that rests on the same broad ground that does the power to repel a foreign navy or army from ravaging the coasts and carrying fire and sword into the interior.

TEXAS.

[San Antonio Daily Express.]

Kansas, Nebraska, or any other inland State is as much concerned in the maintenance of a proper border quarantine service as is Texas.

The prevention of the spread of epidemic diseases being a matter of national importance, it is but just and right that the whole people should bear their fair proportion of the expense of preventing the entrance into our borders and the spreading of epidemic disease.

[Fort Worth Mail-Telegram, October 12, 1897.]

The extemporized and unauthorized citizen quarantines, the senseless shotgun cordons of outlying districts by volunteer bands, and the threatened mob violence against the establishment of hospitals prove the necessity for a more general and more systematized method of quarantine administration than has heretofore been possible.

[San Antonio Daily Express, October 12, 1895.]

The guarding of the nation's boundary properly devolves upon the people of all the States so guarded, and the interior is as much concerned as the boundary territory. This is a matter for Congressional action. Texas can with all justice take the lead in the agitation.

[Dallas News, October, 1895.]

The protection of the national boundary is none the less the duty of the Federal Government because it happens also to be the boundary of a State.

APPENDIX C.

The New England Medical Monthly, in its issue of March, 1898, says editorially:

"But while a public health department is not at this time feasible, the necessity for the establishment of a national quarantine system remains, and we believe that the Marine-Hospital Service should be intrusted with this duty. The splendid contributions to medical science and the quarantine results already achieved by the Marine-Hospital Service entitle it to the gratitude and respect of all medical men, and in no better hands could the enforcement of national quarantine be placed.

"The experience already gained by the service in arresting and preventing epidemics is invaluable, and it should have every opportunity for increased usefulness along these lines. The Caffery bill, now pending, should receive the fullest professional and public indorsement, as it will be the means of making national quarantine at once possible and efficient."

The Philadelphia Medical Journal, in its issue of January 8, 1898, says editorially:

"The distinguishing feature of the bill which flies the flag of the American Medical Association, but which was never adopted by that body, is that it proposes to establish a 'department of public health.' To the ear of the sanitarian this has a very seductive sound. He has long felt that the protection of the public health was one of the great national issues, as well as entitled to recognition as a coordinate branch of Government as either of those the chief function of which is the destruction of human life. The bill, however, does not fulfill the promise of its title. It establishes not a true department, with representation in the Cabinet, but merely a commission.

"As a rule it may be affirmed that a system or institution which has been developed by the process of growth is more serviceable and has in it more elements of permanence than one which has been artificially constructed on theoretic principles, and this because its provisions have been devised to meet actual emergencies. It is not strange, then, that the committee to which was assigned the duty of drawing up a bill for the establishment of such a department found that it could not do better than to adopt the provisions already formulated and put in force by the Marine-Hospital Service, and to propose that the new department should take into its capacious maw that entire service, Surgeon-General, 'building, offices, officers, laboratories and appurtenances, and property of whatever name and nature.'

"It seems, therefore, to be little more than a change of names which is proposed, with the creation of a few additional salaried officers. We have the thing already. The Marine-Hospital Service is in reality the national department of health. The dog in the fable lost his bone in trying to seize its magnified reflection in the rippling stream. Let us be careful how we risk the perpetuity of our present tried and practical, although not thoroughly ideal, system in the troubled waters of a Congressional struggle. The wiser alternative, as we view the matter, is that suggested by that eminent and well-trained sanitarian, the now lamented Jerome Cochran, health officer of Alabama, and then chairman of the very committee which now proposes the bill we have been considering, viz: 'To endeavor to improve the Marine-Hospital Service and to make it a more satisfactory national health department than it now is.'"

The Medical Record, of New York, a professional journal of commanding position, with a clientele extending throughout the civilized world, and which is read in every clime, says editorially in its issue of February 12, 1898:

"There is just now not so much a necessity for educating the public in sanitary matters as for perfecting suitable police regulations for threatening epidemics. Thus it would naturally appear to be reasonable to elaborate, strengthen, and amplify what we may already have in that line, rather than to aim at some new, untried, and obviously unwarrantable measures. From such a point of view the bill of Senator CAFFERY, 'granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service,' deserves the support of everyone who may hope for a logical settlement of the great question at issue.

"This bill has for its purpose such a development of the Marine-Hospital plant as will make it possible for the General Government efficiently to control all maritime and inland quarantine, and is framed on the practical basis of aiding and advising the local authorities and not interfering with them, unless in cases of emergency or when large districts of country are affected and when a general, impartial, and uniform system of protection is demanded. The Secretary of the Treasury naturally remains at the legitimate head of the department.

"Much as it would compliment the medical profession to have a physician in such position as a member of the Cabinet, the proposed measure is the next best solution of a question concerning which there are many pros and cons. The Secretary has already supreme control of maritime customs, and can, on sufficient grounds, refuse the entry of any vessel bound for our ports. When to such power that of enforcing quarantine is added, it is easy to conclude that both functions can work together harmoniously and consistently. Then, again, there can be no question, in this instance, regarding the constitutionality of so-called invasion of State rights, as Congress has the right to regulate commerce and can interfere with anything that pertains to it.

"One very forcible argument in favor of the bill is the fact that the Marine-Hospital Service, having done so much in arresting and preventing epidemics, is fully competent to exercise increased powers in the line of work with which it is already perfectly familiar. With such great interests at stake as the health of the entire nation, there will be no possible temptation to make distinctions in favor of one or other district, but all can come under a uniform regulation, 'as far as climatic conditions will justify.'

"The main opposition to national quarantine comes quite naturally from local authorities, which are jealous of the privileges of revenue and of political patronage. This is evidenced by offers on the part of several States to purchase the present quarantine plants of the Government and manage them as independent establishments. The pecuniary measures which comprise the levying of arbitrary and excessive fees on commerce, and which are the main ones considered by the different State quarantines, are to the last degree oppressive, burdensome, invidious, and unnecessary.

'By a new order of things there will be no call for special fees, and all the ports of entry will be on an equal basis as regards quarantine regulation. The advantages of the latter system are already proven in those localities where only national inspection prevails, by the fact that increased trade is naturally attracted to such favored ports to the exclusion of neighboring ones not so favored. Thus it will be seen that millions of dollars can be saved to commerce which are now demanded on the purely technical ground of State rights to collect special fees.

"It is useless, however, to multiply arguments in favor of national quarantine. The real question that concerns us now has reference to the best and readiest means to the desirable and imperative end. The best answers to objections urged against all bills heretofore presented are very effectively, consistently, and practically given in the admirable, far-reaching, comprehensive, and just provisions of the Caffery bill. The Marine-Hospital Service eminently deserves every opportunity for increased usefulness and good work. Even with its limited resources it has made an admirable and unimpeachable record. The profession and the public should be ready with their indorsement at the time when such is so much needed to make all the really necessary quarantine reforms within the reach of ready realization."

The Medical Standard, of Chicago, in its issue of January, 1898, says editorially:

"The recent epidemic in certain parts of the South has directed public attention to the necessity for broader and more efficient regulations for the protection of the public health. Many objections that formerly were urged against the proposition to place the quarantine power wholly in the hands of the Federal officials have been withdrawn, and that section of the country which heretofore has most strenuously opposed Federal control has now asked Congress to provide such control. The bill recently introduced by Mr. CAFFERY, of Louisiana, in the United States Senate is in response to this demand.

"In view of these circumstances, it would appear that the wisest course lies in introducing a bill in Congress which will take the Marine-Hospital Service as a nucleus and establish an unattached bureau clothed with the authority for national quarantine that is asked for from the South. Under the direction of this bureau, then, such investigations as that proposed into yellow-fever conditions in Cuba and leprosy in Hawaii, which, it is reported, are to be made subjects of Congressional action, may be conducted. The unattached bureau would not cost more than will the performance of the same duties under separate divisions, and certainly would prove far more efficient. Thus equipped and permitted to show the public its field of usefulness, this bureau of public health will have every opportunity to develop at an early date into one of the Departments."

The Sanitarian, of New York, one of the oldest journals of its class in the United States, says editorially in its issue of December, 1897:

"Indeed, the foundation of a national board of health is already laid. The proposition to extend its scope by such emendations and additions to the laws now governing it as would secure the cooperation of the sanitary authorities of the States severally and jointly, as suggested by the late Dr. Jerome Cochran, after a critical examination, is eminently commendable. And in this reference to the judgment of Dr. Cochran it should be borne in mind that it was the deduction of a practical sanitarian—of one who had devoted many years of his professional life to preventive medicine, and after he had, as chairman of a committee, specially appointed to consider the question of a 'Department of public health.'

"Considering all the circumstances and the relations of the leaders of the proposition to supersede the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service to the present chief of that service, we can but regard the proposition as being alike discreditable to both the American medical and the American public-health associations.

"The proposition reflects political preferment to practical knowledge of preventive medicine; it deserves not only the reprobation of every practical sanitarian, but of every person who is alive to the importance of an effective health service."

The Bulletin of the North Carolina board of health, in its issue of December, 1897, says editorially:

"For carrying out the idea of a national quarantine two plans have been suggested. One is to commit it to the Marine-Hospital Service, which Bureau has for many years been engaged in quarantine work, by enlarging its powers and adding to its duties; the other is the establishment of a department of public health.

"In pursuance of the former plan Senator CAFFERY, of Louisiana, introduced in the Senate the following bill:

A bill amending "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893.

Be it enacted, etc., That "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893, be amended by striking out the following words in section 1: "And with such rules and regulations of State and municipal health authorities as may be made in pursuance of or consistent with this act," and striking out section 3 and inserting the following in the place of said section:

"SEC. 3. That immediately after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall make such rules and regulations as are necessary to prevent the introduction into the United States of any infectious or contagious disease from any foreign port or place, or the spread of such diseases from one domestic port to another, and such necessary rules and regulations as shall be observed by vessels or vehicles departing from foreign ports or places for ports or places in the United States to secure the best sanitary condition of such vessels or vehicles, their cargoes, passengers, and crews, which rules and regulations shall be published and communicated to and enforced by consular, quarantine, and customs officers of the United States and the State and local quarantine officers of the United States. All rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury shall operate uniformly, so far as climatic conditions will justify, in the interest of security against the introduction or spread of said infectious and contagious diseases, and shall not discriminate against any port or place. None of the penalties herein imposed shall attach to any vessel from a foreign port, or owner or officer thereof, until a copy of this act, with the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof, has been posted up in the office of the consul or other consular officer of the United States for ten days in the port from which said vessel sailed, and the certificate of such consul or consular officer, over his official signature, shall be competent evidence of such posting in any court of the United States. Nor shall the penalties imposed by this act attach to any common carrier or officer, agent, or employee of any common carrier crossing the border of the United States until a copy of this act, with the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof, has been published and made publicly known.

"At any port or place in the United States where the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem it necessary for the prevention of the introduction of contagious or infectious disease from a foreign port or place that incoming vessels, vehicles, or persons shall be inspected by a national quarantine officer, such officer shall be designated or appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, on recommendation of the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, and at any such port or place no vessel, vehicle, or person from a foreign port or place shall be admitted to entry or enter without the certificate of said officer that the United States quarantine regulations have been complied with.

"Any vessel sailing from any foreign port without a United States consular bill of health and arriving within the limits of any collection district of the United States, and not entering or attempting to enter any port of the United States, shall be subject to such quarantine measures as shall be prescribed by regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the cost of such measures shall be a lien on said vessel, to be recovered by proceedings in the proper district court of the United States and in the manner set forth above as regards vessels from foreign ports without bills of health and entering any port of the United States.

"National quarantine stations now in operation shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of this act, and the Supervising Surgeon-General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to designate and mark the boundaries of the quarantine grounds and quarantine anchorages for vessels, which are reserved for use at each United States quarantine station; and any vessel, or officer of any vessel, or other person, trespassing upon such grounds or anchorages, in disregard of the quarantine rules and regulations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to arrest, and, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $300, or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"And any master or owner of any vessel, or any person violating any rule or regulation made in accordance with this act, relating to inspection of vessels, or relating to the prevention of the introduction of contagious or infectious disease, and any master, owner, or agent of any vessel making a false statement relative to the sanitary condition of said vessel or its contents, or as to the health of any passenger or person thereon, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to arrest, and, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"Medical officers of the United States, duly clothed with authority to act as quarantine officers at any port or place within the United States, and when performing such duties, are hereby authorized to take declarations and administer oaths in matters pertaining to the administration of the quarantine laws and regulations of the United States.

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall, whenever in his judgment it is necessary, make rules and regulations to prevent the introduction of infectious or contagious diseases into one State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, from another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, and when such rules and regulations have been made they shall be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury and enforced by the sanitary authorities of the States and municipalities when the State or municipal authorities will undertake to execute or enforce them; but if the State or municipal authorities shall fail or refuse to enforce said rules and regulations, or other rules or regulations made under the provisions of this act, the President shall execute and enforce the same, and adopt such measures as in his judgment shall be necessary to prevent the introduction or spread of such diseases, and may detail or appoint officers for that purpose.

"Whenever yellow fever, cholera, plague, or typhus fever has passed the quarantines of the United States, or in any manner any one of these diseases has gained entrance or has appeared within the limits of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, the quarantine regulations of the United States, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be supreme and have precedence of State or municipal quarantine laws, rules, or regulations, and the President is authorized to enforce the same within the limits of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, and to control the movement of vessels, railway trains, vehicles, or persons within any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to prevent these diseases from spreading from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, and to prevent unneccessary restrictions upon interstate commerce; and whenever, in accordance with the rules and regulations made as herein authorized to prohibit or permit the movement of vessels, railway trains, and vehicles, or transportation of persons, prohibitions or permits have been made or granted, any person violating said prohibition or permit shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than twelve months, or both, at the discretion of the court; and any violation of said prohibition or permit shall be reported to the United States district attorney for the district in which the offense has been committed, who shall thereupon institute necessary proceedings for the recovery of the penalty herein imposed."

That section 6 of said act shall be amended to read as follows:

"That on the arrival of an infected vessel at any port not provided with proper facilities for treatment of the same, the Secretary of the Treasury may remand said vessel, at its own expense, to the nearest national or other quarantine station, where accommodations and appliances are provided for the necessary disinfection and treatment of the vessel, passengers, and cargo; and after treatment of any infected vessel, or inspection of any vessel not infected at a national quarantine station, and after certificate shall have been given by the United States quarantine officer at said station that the vessel, cargo, and passengers are each and all free from infectious disease, or danger of conveying the same, said vessel shall be permitted to enter and admitted to entry at any port of the United States named within the certificate. But at any ports where sufficient quarantine provision has been made by State or local authorities, the Secretary of the Treasury may direct vessels bound for said ports to undergo quarantine at said State or local station."

That section 8 of said act shall be amended to read as follows:

"That whenever the proper authorities of a State shall surrender to the United States the use of the buildings, grounds, and disinfecting apparatus at a State or municipal quarantine station, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to purchase them at a reasonable compensation, or pay a reasonable rental for their use, if in his opinion they are necessary to the United States; and the expense of said purchase or rental is made payable from the epidemic fund."

"We would call attention to the fact that the author of this bill is a Southern Democratic Senator, and doubtless a thorough believer in the doctrine of State sovereignty; and also to the fact that he represents Louisiana, whose quarantine facilities and methods are unexcelled anywhere.

"The Marine-Hospital Service, as at present constituted, is as far from the baneful influence of 'practical politics' as are the Army and Navy. Its members are appointed solely for fitness, and their business in life is fighting disease—large throughly quarantine work. They are seasoned veterans in that peculiar warfare.

"Their commanding officer, the Surgeon-General, is always one of their most experienced men, and while it might happen that he was not the man in the service best fitted for that position, it would always be true that he had been thoroughly trained in the business. And if it were our personal business involving great consequences to us, as the proper management of our quarantine service does to the people of our country, we would not hesitate a moment in deciding in favor of the trained experts—and we do not believe the candid reader would, either."

The Georgia Journal of Medicine and Surgery, in its issue of August, 1897, says editorially:

"In this issue we quote in full the 'bill to establish a department of public health and to define its duties,' as reported at the last meeting of the American Medical Association at Philadelphia. The bill was not adopted by the association, but was received and the committee continued.

"So important a matter as this should be fully discussed and thoroughly understood, and the present condition of affairs at Washington, as regards the Marine-Hospital Service, known and appreciated, before the indorsement and aid of the profession is given to it.

"How much more just and fair and how much better for the country, therefore, it seems to us, to draft a bill imposing additional duties and enlarging the field of usefulness of that very important department of public health (which it now is), the Marine-Hospital Service, and including in the Marine-Hospital bill all the good features (for they are practically and virtually carried out in toto by the Marine Service at this moment) of the new bill under discussion, without its objections.

"An epidemic or emergency fund is at the disposal of the Marine-Hospital Service in case of necessity in occurrence of epidemics in any of the States or Territories. The service has means at its disposal, and is thoroughly capable of fulfilling the most minute requirements of the new bill."

The New York Medical Journal, in its issue of December 25, 1897, says editorially:

"It is unfair to criticise the work of a person or a number of persons who are operating at a disadvantage by reason of insufficient tools or inefficient laws. The national control of epidemics through the Marine-Hospital Service has been largely hampered in the past by the objections of State-rights theorists. This has been largely overcome by practical experience. The Marine-Hospital Service has had to wait until the inefficiency of certain local measures was established, and only then would it step in and exert its powers.

"Thus the early and favorable time was lost when work should have been done to restrain the onward progress of a threatened epidemic. It is the fault of the law and not of the service that certain concessions have not been made to the satisfaction of persons who are interested, or profess to be interested for one reason or another, in the development of an improved health service. Senator CAFFERY'S bill, which would confer great powers upon the Secretary of the Treasury, seems to us a far more promising measure than any scheme for a national board of health."

The Medical News, of New York, in its issue of February 5, 1898, says editorially:

"Any movement which has for its cardinal text the relegation of the Marine-Hospital Service, which has done so much pioneer work in the interests of public health, to a secondary or even more obscure position in the ambitious plans of its enemies will not meet with a responsive chord in the minds of the majority.

"The service is developing in the exact direction which the promoters of the proposed department of public health expect to attain by one act of legislation.

"The Senate, upon the recommendation of its Committee on Public Health and Quarantine, has already indefinitely postponed two bills for the establishment of a department of public health, and favorably reported the Caffery bill, which imposes additional powers and duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service.

"In view of the state of the national finances and the improbability of Congress assenting to the large and indefinite expenditure necessary for the establishment of a department of public health, it seems to us that the profession should turn its attention to developing and supporting the Marine-Hospital Service as the public health service de jure as well as de facto, and that those who are now, as we think, mistakenly, if honestly, expending their efforts in the attempt to create a department of public health should join with their fellows in strengthening the hands of their professional brothers in the Marine-Hospital Service who have been so long and faithfully serving the public."

Editorial expressions of a similar character, appearing in the issues of this journal under date of December 4, 11, and 18 and February 19, might be cited if it were necessary to submit cumulative views from the same source.

APPENDIX D.

MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The function of the Marine-Hospital Service may be seen by an enumeration of the various duties of its officers, as follows:

1. The management of hospitals and relief stations for the care of sick and disabled seamen of the merchant marine of the United States, over 50,000 seamen being treated annually.

2. The active management of eleven national quarantine stations, including the steam vessels belonging thereto. These national quarantine stations, particularly in the South, are the refuge stations for neighboring local quarantines, and for a large number of years have done the greater part of the actual cleansing and disinfecting of infected vessels. In the last fifteen years their hospitals have, with but few exceptions, received and cared for all the yellow-fever patients taken from vessels entering United States ports.

3. Inspection of local quarantines, under the act of February 15, 1893.

4. Investigation of reported cases of epidemic disease, including bacteriologic examinations and local sanitary conditions.

5. The suppression of epidemic diseases and enforcement of the interstate quarantine regulations.
6. The collection and dissemination of mortality statistics and sanitary information.
7. Scientific investigation into the causes of disease.
8. The examination of pilots for color-blindness.
9. Physical examination of keepers and crews of the life-saving stations; professional examination of their claims on account of disability and their treatment in hospital.
10. Physical examination and treatment of the officers and crews of the Revenue-Cutter Service, both prior and subsequent to enlistment, and medical and surgical service under special detail on revenue cutters engaged in arctic cruising or on other long voyages.
11. Physical examination of immigrants under the law excluding those afflicted with contagious disease.
12. Service in the office of consuls at foreign ports to assure the accuracy of bills of health given to vessels.
13. Miscellaneous duties imposed from time to time by the Treasury Department.

A few words now regarding the organization and scope of the Marine-Hospital Service.

MEDICAL CORPS.

The medical corps of the Marine-Hospital Service consists of a supervising surgeon-general, 16 surgeons, 32 passed assistant surgeons, 17 assistant surgeons, and 96 acting assistant surgeons, making a total of 161. The regular corps, that is to say, all of the above excepting the acting assistant surgeons, are appointed by the President after thorough physical and professional examination.

The acting assistant surgeons are appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, on recommendation of the Supervising Surgeon-General, who satisfies himself as to the professional qualifications of the officer. The employment of acting assistant surgeons in times of emergency for temporary service, and the discontinuance of their services when the emergency is over, furnishes an excellent method of increasing or contracting the medical corps as occasion requires.

The acting assistant surgeons are men who have been long in the service and are trained in Government routine. When newly appointed in emergency they are usually assigned to a marine hospital under the observation of the commanding officer and one of the older assistants, detailed to meet the emergency.

I have heard that intimations have been made concerning the youth and inexperience of the members of the regular corps, the absurdity of which is shown by a table which I have caused to be prepared, giving the age and date of graduation of every officer of the service. From this table it will be seen that the average age of the surgeons is 50 years, the average age of the passed assistant surgeons is 35 years, and of the assistant surgeons, 29 years.

The medical colleges represented are as follows:

Medical College of Maine.
Western Reserve Medical College.
Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia.
Pennsylvania Medical College.
Chicago Medical College.
Rush Medical College.
University of Georgetown, D. C.
University of Michigan.
Columbia College, Washington, D. C.
Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York.
National Medical College, Washington, D. C.
University of Pennsylvania.
University of Maryland.
College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York.
College of Physicians and Surgeons, Baltimore.
College of Physicians and Surgeons, Boston.
Dartmouth Medical College, New Hampshire.
McGill College, Montreal, Canada.
Harvard Medical School, Boston.
Howard University, Washington, D. C.
Medical College, South Carolina.
Virginia Medical College.
University of Virginia.
Miami Medical School, Cincinnati.
Long Island Medical College, New York.
St. Louis Medical College.

It will thus be seen that the members of this corps are fairly representative of the medical profession of the country. Many of them, in spite of the fact that they are subject to change of station every four years or oftener, have held and are now holding professorships in the medical colleges of the cities in which they are stationed.

Concerning the new admissions to the corps, the law requires that they shall be appointed to the grade of assistant surgeon only, and provision is made for subsequent promotion. The examination is held once or twice a year, as occasion requires, and the applicant must pass a very severe test, making an average of 80 per cent on all branches.

The successful candidates are relatively few. For example, this month, out of 29 who appeared for examination, only 4 made the required grade. These new appointees represent the very best men among the newer graduates of the colleges; but very rarely do they come direct from the medical college, most of them having had hospital or private practice before seeking admission to the corps. Out of the total 61 medical officers, 53 had hospital practice before entering the service, 7 were engaged in private practice, and only 2 had neither private practice nor hospital service.

There are 20 hospitals owned and operated by the service and 107 additional relief stations where at contract hospitals seamen are admitted and treated by acting assistant surgeons.

The Marine-Hospital Service, even when considered solely in the light of its original function—the care of sick and disabled seamen—is a very important element in public-health work. The name itself now conveys no adequate idea of its scope, but the service is a century old, and its functions have been added to from time to time by Congress to such an extent that it is a somewhat laborious and tiresome task to enumerate all that it is doing.

But in its original restricted capacity it has by careful selection of its officers, and appointment only after rigid examination, and its entire removal from political influence, established a corps of medical men, under strict discipline, divorced from local influences and made familiar, to a degree unusual among medical men, with correct business habits and the systematic methods upon which is dependent the success of all large organizations and of government itself.

DISTRIBUTION AND QUALIFICATIONS OF THE CORPS.

The officers of the medical corps just mentioned are stationed in every important port on the coast, lakes, and rivers, and being trained in the execution of Government business, become valuable agents for the immediate execution of any sanitary measures which may be imposed upon them by telegraph or otherwise from the Bureau. It is always possible for the Marine-Hospital Service, in any part of the country, on the shortest notice, to have qualified agents at a place of danger. There is scarcely an officer of the regular corps who has not had actual quarantine experience, and the corps numbers among its members men whose names have become national by reason of their effective service in various epidemics.

The corps embraces a number of skilled bacteriologists, also men who have had large practical experience in the treatment of yellow fever and other contagious diseases, men thoroughly acquainted with all the military duties connected with sanitary cordons, detention camps, and with the methods of train and vessel inspections, scientific disinfection, etc. The effectiveness of this corps is the result of special care exercised to secure within it men who, by natural inclination and special education, are fitted for sanitary work, and is also the result of long and active experience.

The Marine-Hospital Service dates as far back as 1798. It was reorganized and put upon its present basis in 1871. Though established for the purpose of caring for sick and disabled seamen of the merchant marine of the United States, there have been from time to time other responsibilities imposed upon it, growing out of the necessities of other branches of the Government, with which it is intimately and necessarily associated. For example, the Revenue-Marine Service, a branch of the Treasury Department, relies upon the Marine-Hospital Service for the physical examination of its officers and men and their professional treatment when sick or disabled.

The Life-Saving Service relies upon the Marine-Hospital Service for the physical examination of the keepers and surfmen. Hundreds of rejections of physically unsound men seeking to become surfmen have been made by the officers of the Marine-Hospital Service. The Steamboat-Inspection Service, a most important branch of the Treasury, relies upon the medical officers of the Marine-Hospital Service for a determination as to the ability of the pilots to distinguish signal lights, and large numbers of applicants for pilots' licenses are annually rejected by the officers of the service on account of color blindness. The Immigration Bureau relies by law upon the Marine-Hospital Service for the medical inspection of immigrants.

Naturally, too, by reason of the intimate association of the Marine-Hospital Service, through its sailors, with shipping and commerce, the National Government has imposed upon this service the execution of the national quarantine laws, to which reference has already been made. I will only add here that so far as national quarantine is concerned, the service, by tradition and constant activity, save for a period of four years, is the natural executor of the same. National quarantine received its first executive impulse through the first Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, Dr. John M. Woodworth, in 1878.

Both prior and subsequent to this last date the Bureau has controlled, wholly or in part, epidemics of yellow fever and of smallpox.

YELLOW FEVER.

Notably yellow fever in 1878, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1882, 1887, 1888, and in 1893, the Brunswick epidemic, when it was confined within the cordon lines established by the service.

It had complete control of the quarantine measures against yellow fever in Texas in 1882 and in Florida in 1888.

And the operations of the service during the yellow fever outbreak last fall are of too recent occurrence to require special description. The satisfactory results of these, both in restricting the spread of this disease and at the same time removing, so far as was practicable under the present law, unnecessary restrictions upon commerce, have been freely and favorably commented upon by the press of the South.

SMALLPOX.

It also took charge of railroad quarantine against smallpox in Canada in 1888 and 1891, and at Harris Neck, Ga., in 1891, it stamped out the disease.

In 1894 it very materially assisted the District Commissioners and health officer of the District of Columbia in promptly suppressing the smallpox which had appeared in the city of Washington.

In 1895 it corralled at Eagle Pass., Tex., 400 immigrants from Mexico to Texas, with smallpox among them, and prevented their disseminating the disease through Texas and other States.

It established quarantine camps in Arkansas in 1896, preventing the disease from being spread across the river into Tennessee. And at Key West, Fla., in 1896, it materially aided the State health officer in suppressing the epidemic of smallpox then prevailing. It aided materially the same year in suppressing the disease in Staunton, Va., and in New Orleans.

At the present time it is engaged in suppressing an epidemic of smallpox in Birmingham and other localities in Alabama and Georgia.

CHOLERA.

With regard to cholera in 1893, when one case of cholera had gained admission into Jersey City, with the supervision of its experienced officers and with their trained assistants it prevented any extension of the disease. The value of its service in 1893 in preventing cholera in reaching the shores of the United States may be illustrated by one example, viz., the record of the service at Naples, Italy:

After cholera had been declared epidemic in Naples, three vessels left for the United States—the Masilia, Weser, and Cashmere—and all were made to conform to the regulations. They all arrived at the port of New York, with no cholera en route, or at time of arrival. During the same period four vessels, with the same class of passengers, and their places of origin similar, in many cases identical, the water and food supply being the same as on the vessels for the United States, left for South America, and all were turned back by the South American authorities and returned to Naples. One, the Vincenzia Floria, had about 50 deaths; the Andrea Gloria, 90 on the way out—total not ascertained. Another, 84 deaths, and the fourth, 230 deaths from cholera.

THE NATIONAL QUARANTINE STATIONS.

The Marine-Hospital Service has under its immediate control eleven national quarantine stations equipped with modern appliances for disinfection of vessels, hospitals for the care of the sick, and barracks, where required, for the detention of suspected immigrants.

These stations are located at Delaware Breakwater, Reedy Island, Delaware River; Cape Charles, Virginia; Blackbeard Island, Sapelo Sound, Georgia; Brunswick, Ga.; Dry Tortugas, Fla.; Ship Island, Gulf of Mexico, off the coast of Mississippi; San Diego, Cal.; Angel Island, San Francisco Bay, California; Port Townsend, Wash.; Cape Fear Quarantine, Southport, N. C.

These stations are so far remote from populous centers as to be seldom visited, but their completeness and the scientific care exercised in isolation of the sick, the surveillance of those suspected and held under observation, the cleansing and disinfection of vessels, have excited the surprise and commendation of the few members of Congress who have visited one or more of said stations. There is a fleet of thirteen vessels connected with these stations, three of them being old vessels turned over from the Navy for the purpose of receiving and housing people in quarantine.

COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS.

Now, referring to the work done by the Marine-Hospital Service for other branches of the Government—namely, the Revenue Marine, the Life-Saving Service, Steamboat-Inspection Service, and Immigration Service—a return service on the part of these branches of the Government adds to the strength and ability of the Marine-Hospital Service for quarantine work. For example, the Revenue-Cutter Service, under the same Secretary as is the Marine-Hospital Service, may be called upon at any time, and frequently is, to assist in quarantine measures through the medium of their fleet of vessels.

In 1893 they patrolled the Southern coast in aid of the quarantine cordon around Brunswick. They carried medical officers and supplies to the Sea Islands, off the coast of South Carolina, in the sanitary work demanded of the Marine-Hospital Service by reason of the great storm. They have furnished vessels for the Marine-Hospital Service repeatedly in New York Harbor, and in fact practically form a fleet subject to demand for service at any time in the aid of quarantine.

In 1893, when it was feared that the immigrant detention camps at Camp Low and at Delaware Breakwater, both under the control of the Marine-Hospital Service, might of necessity be occupied by immigrants held under observation, an arrangement was made with the Revenue-Marine Service for the immediate detail of their enlisted and armed men from the several cutters, to form the necessary guards around these camps, the places of the enlisted men to be supplied by new enlistments on the vessels.

The Steamboat-Inspection Service, in return for the examination of pilots, furnishes experts to examine the hulls, boilers, and machinery of the vessels which belong to the Marine-Hospital Service.

The Life-Saving Service, on request of the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, is required by its Superintendent to watch carefully for all dunnage and other stuff that might float ashore from infected vessels, thrown overboard before said vessels reach port; to gather up with rakes such material and burn it.

The presence of medical officers at the immigrant reception stations at the several ports enables the Bureau to keep fully informed with regard to immigrants and their baggage, which constitute so large a proportion of the danger in the matter of epidemic importation.

OFFICIAL REQUESTS FOR THE ASSISTANCE OF THE MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The demands for the assistance of the Marine-Hospital Service on the part of State and local quarantine authorities have been almost innumerable. In 1893 the legislature of Pennsylvania made a request by resolution, duly forwarded by the governor of the State, calling upon the Marine-Hospital Service to establish the Reedy Island quarantine station to protect the city of Philadelphia and the rest of the State of Pennsylvania from cholera.

Requests to prevent the spread of smallpox have been received from the health officers of the State of Virginia.

Request for aid in suppressing the cholera was made by the State and local authorities at Jersey City, N. J., in 1893.

Requests have been received from the mayors of several municipal localities in North Carolina and through State health officers to assist in the suppression of smallpox.

Also from the representatives and municipal authorities in Georgia for the same purpose.

Also from the governor and health authorities in Florida in suppressing yellow fever and smallpox.

Also from the governor and State health officer of Alabama for the suppression of smallpox.

Also from the representatives and State health authorities of Mississippi in the suppression of yellow fever.

Request has also been received from the State health authorities of Louisiana for aid in disinfection and other sanitary measures necessary to prevent the spread of yellow fever; from Tennessee to protect the State from smallpox invasion; from the State health officer of Texas for the same purpose; also from Arkansas.

Requests have also been received from the State health authorities in California to protect them from the invasion of smallpox from Mexico. In fact, wherever expert service is required through reason of doubt as to diagnosis on the part of local authorities, or where sanitary rules, laws, and regulations are insufficient, or where the local authorities are unfamiliar with the methods necessary to suppress epidemic diseases, or where funds are absolutely lacking, the Marine-Hospital Service is called upon constantly to supply the several deficiencies.

SCIENTIFIC INVESTIGATIONS.

A schedule of work performed in the hygienic laboratory of the Marine-Hospital Service since its establishment in 1887 to date.

1887.

In August, 1887, a bacteriological laboratory was established at the port of New York for the purpose of utilizing the rich clinical material in the marine hospital in pursuing investigations regarding the etiology and pathology of disease, more especially the acute infectious and contagious maladies.

In October, 1887, the steamships Alesia and Britannia arrived from Naples, Italy, the former having several well-marked cases of cholera aboard. These were utilized in making a bacteriological study. Two weeks after the arrival of the Alesia the Britannia arrived, and having had three deaths en voyage, the cause of which was obscure, two of the persons on board were found to be slightly ill, and, on bacteriological examinations, were found to be suffering from Asiatic cholera.

An analysis of the water of the New York bays was made during the same year, to determine whether there was a possibility of cholera reaching the shore from the dejecta from those suffering from the disease.

1888.

Investigation and report on gaseous and other disinfecting agents for quarantine purposes.

Report on the inspection of the Louisiana State quarantine station with recommendations. This report and subsequent studies caused the authorities of the State to entirely remodel their apparatus and was the commencement of the adoption of the perfected apparatus with which the national and State quarantine stations are equipped to-day.

1889.

Studies in the etiology of malarial fever.

Report on entero-malarial fever.

Report on the influence of low temperatures on the symbiosis of microorganisms.

Experiments relating to the cure of cholera by the administering of cobra venom.

1890.

Report on the work performed in the laboratory of the Marine-Hospital Service, and observations and studies in the laboratories in Berlin and Paris. (Kinyoun.)

Report of laboratory of the Marine-Hospital Service, Tortugas, Florida. (Geddings.)

Official experiments with tuberculin. (Geddings.)

1894.

Report on the preparation and use of diphtheritic antitoxin.

Report on examination of specimens from suspected cases of cholera.

Report on the ventilation of the House of Representatives.

1895.

Preliminary report on the serum-therapy of variola.

Preparation of diphtheria antitoxin.

Investigation of the pollution of water supplies of the District of Columbia with special reference to typhoid fever.

1888–1895.

Experiments were continuous in devising and perfecting apparatus and appliances for use at quarantine stations—maritime and interstate.

PAPERS AND REPORTS FROM THE HYGIENIC LABORATORY FOR 1896–97.

1. Formaldehyd as a disinfecting agent.
2. The disinfection of the railway coach.
3. On the bacillus of the bubonic plague.
4. On the clinical diagnosis of enteric fever.
5. A contribution to the study of malarial fevers in the District of Columbia.
6. A preliminary report on the sero-therapy of pneumonia.
7. A report on the cause and treatment of smallpox.
8. A report on the international congress relating to the sanitary condition of railways and vessels.
9. A report on the international leprosy conference.
10. A report on the preparation, conservation, and use of animal vaccine.

APPENDIX E.

[Southern Pacific Company. W. G. Van Vleck, manager; T. Fay, manager's assistant.]

NEW ORLEANS, LA., December 17, 1897.

MY DEAR SIR: In further reply to your letter of December 10 on the subject of the effect of quarantine on traffic of this company during the late fever, I will endeavor to give you a complete history of this matter as it affected the Southern Pacific road and the country through which it passes. In the New Orleans papers on September 6 the board of health announced officially one death from yellow fever in this city. The next morning many towns in Louisiana along our line placed an embargo on passengers and freight from New Orleans, Jeanerette being the first town to take such action.

From this date quarantine restrictions were enacted in rapid succession, and on the 11th day of September practically every town in Louisiana on this road had placed an embargo on freight and passengers from or passing through New Orleans. On that date, according to statement of the board of health, there had been only one death from yellow fever in this city and no new cases had been reported. Appreciating that our country friends might not have entire confidence in the board of health here, and feeling assured that traffic was being interfered with to a greater extent than the situation justified, I called upon Mayor Flower to see if he would not telegraph the situation to the mayors of the different towns, which I hoped would serve to allay the then groundless fears of the people and prevent the utter demoralization of business and railroad traffic. The mayor wrote with his own hand the following telegram:

"NEW ORLEANS, September 11, 1897.

"There is no authentic case of yellow fever in New Orleans to-day. Development of any yellow fever will be promptly reported."

This was sent at once to the mayors of Houma, Morgan City, Thibodaux, Pattersonville, Franklin, Jeanerette, New Iberia, St. Martinsville, Lafayette, Opelousas, Washington, Alexandria, Crowley, Lake Charles, Rayne, and Abbeville.

This message produced absolutely no effect, as there was not a single instance of modification of restrictions following it. A new feature of quarantine restrictions was brought out this year in the quarantining of whole parishes, which was not attempted during any previous visitation of yellow fever to this section. Formerly towns and villages quarantined, but there was no such thing generally as a parish quarantine.

On the same day we received notice of quarantine by Galveston against New Orleans, which was the first Texas town to take such action. On September 12 the city of Houston quarantined against New Orleans and commenced to stop all trains at city limits for examination. On September 13 the whole State of Texas quarantined against all freight or passengers from or through New Orleans. On September 14 we found it necessary to discontinue running the daylight passenger trains between New Orleans and Houston, as all points had quarantined and the trains were doing no business. The Texas health authorities, on September 13, notified us that they would not permit the United States mail agents (postal clerks) to pass beyond the Louisiana State line after that date.

On the night of September 13, Dr. Swearingen, State health officer of Texas, being in Houston, a conference was held with him and the mayor of that city by the officials of the railroad company with the view to keeping open for transcontinental freight the New York steamship line via Algiers. It was shown to the Texas authorities that there had not been even a suspicious case of fever in Algiers, and as the wharves of the Southern Pacific are isolated, it was thought impossible for any danger to come to the State of Texas by allowing New York freight from these ships, transferred from ship to cars at Algiers, to go into or pass through Texas.

The health authorities of that State finally took this view of the matter, with the understanding that they would send an inspector appointed by themselves, to supervise the loading of freight from ship to cars on the Algiers wharf, which cars were to be allowed to go into Texas and to pass through, upon a certificate from the inspector tacked on each car.

This company even went further than required by the Texas authorities in throwing safeguards around the handling of freight in this manner, and we arranged to employ none but Algiers labor, temporarily, in unloading these ships and loading cars. The necessity for this was explained to the laborers from New Orleans as requisite to the continued handling of the ships from and to this port.

Before this arrangement was made we were in hourly fear of interruption of through traffic into Texas, and had each of the steamers call at the passes for orders in anticipation of being compelled to send them to Galveston.

The Texas authorities, however, though allowing the New York freight to be handled in accordance with the above arrangement, positively refused to allow any freight from or passing through New Orleans to enter that State, and before we could get notice to them about 100 cars of freight delivered to us by connecting railroads at New Orleans for the West were thrown on our hands. Such articles as iron water pipes, iron, coke, etc., from Alabama, machinery, hardware, etc., while recognized by all authorities in health matters as being impossible of conveying infection, were refused entrance into Texas, and we were also forbidden to haul coal for the use of our engines through New Orleans to the coaling stations at Beaumont and Houston. Several cars containing such articles as sugar and molasses, which left New Orleans before Texas adopted any restrictions, were stopped at Sabine River, and we were forced to bring them back to New Orleans and return to shippers.

On September 15, in spite of the arrangement made with the State health officer of Texas to handle New York freight for Texas points by ships through Algiers, the city of Galveston instituted quarantine on its own account, and declined to allow any more of this freight to come into that place. Without any previous warning, and without giving time to stop shipments of Galveston freight at New York, these regulations were put in force, and we were caught with a number of carloads of Galveston freight on the line and in ships due, which we were eventually forced to return to New York and reship by direct steamer to Galveston.

On September 16 the parish of Rapides refused to allow any more trains from New Orleans to enter that parish, and this company was forced to discontinue the operation of trains on the Alexandria branch beyond Cheneyville, and about the same time the town council of Opelousas passed a resolution imposing a penalty of $1,000 fine on any common carrier landing merchandise of any kind in that town from any point on and after September 18.

On September 16 the steamer Aransas, arriving here, had some Chinese in bond going through to Hongkong. They were exposed absolutely to no infection, and a request on the Texas authorities to allow them to pass through the State was refused, though it was well known that this company is always compelled to send guards with Chinese to see that they do not escape into the United States; hence there was no possibility of their getting off the train in Texas.

One of the many brutal features of the quarantine restrictions was brought out about this time by a request made upon me by Mr. John Day, the chief clerk of the Railway Mail Service here, to have an empty car placed in a siding at the Louisiana State line for use of mail clerks running out of New Orleans. Although the Texas quarantine officers had ample accommodations for these clerks at their camp, I was informed they refused either to give or sell the clerks food or shelter, and until this empty car was furnished by us these clerks were forced to sleep in the woods by the inhumanity of the guards. Some of them went nineteen and twenty hours without food.

From the 16th to the 18th of September there was nothing remarkable to record, except a general tightening up of the restrictions at all points. On the afternoon of September 18 the city of Houston declined to allow any more passenger trains from Louisiana to enter its limits, and the night passenger trains over the line were run only to and from the Sabine River on that date. The next day, however, this was modified, provided we would agree to fumigate all passenger cars at Algiers immediately before departure. This was carried out promptly, and the trains resumed their runs.

On September 20 State Health Officer Swearingen, of Texas, issued instructions to us that he would not allow the mail cars to go directly into Texas, but that they must be switched off at the Sabine River and held there twenty-four hours for fumigation at his hands.

On the morning of September 22 we were advised by State Health Officer Swearingen that there was a suspicious case of fever at Beaumont, and the company would probably not be allowed to run any more trains in either direction through that place. Later in the day this threat was put into effect, and no more trains were allowed to pass through Beaumont in either direction. This not only compelled the entire abandonment of passenger and mail service between New Orleans and the West, but it also stopped immediately the passage of all New York freight from ships at Algiers. After the agreement made with the Texas authorities for the continued handling of this freight, it was an act of exceeding bad faith on their part to abrogate it on a moment's notice.

The result was one ship's cargo was tied up at Algiers and the large part of a previous ship's cargo was caught east of the Sabine River, necessitating its being returned to Algiers, unloaded, and subsequently returned to New York for forwarding by direct steamer via Galveston. The alleged reason for this sudden and unwarranted interference with all traffic was that there was a case of yellow fever at Beaumont. Whilst bowing to the arbitrary action of the Texas health authorities, their attention was called to the fact that these two cargoes were on hand, brought here under an arrangement made with them which the railroad company had more than complied with and naturally had the right to expect would not be abrogated on a moment's notice.

As the ostensible reason given by the Texas State health officer for their stopping the entire traffic of a large transcontinental railroad was that there was a case of yellow fever at Beaumont, a request was made on him for permission to send the two cargoes on hand into Texas by way of the Texas and Pacific to Dallas, thence down the Houston and Texas Central, leaving Beaumont several hundred miles to the south. Strange to say, however, such an entirely reasonable request was promptly refused.

As a last resort, the opinion of Dr. Carter, of the Marine-Hospital Service, was sought as to the chances of the cars containing these two cargoes carrying infection from Beaumont in merely passing through that place. Dr. Carter said there was no possible danger, but in order to make sure he would personally attend to the proper disinfection of the cars in any manner designated by the Texas health authorities and give a certificate with each and every car. This proposition was laid before the Texas health authorities and also refused.

Being unable to longer continue the handling of freight of any kind into Texas, the New York steamers due were held at the Passes and ordered to proceed to Galveston, and those in New York were ordered to Galveston direct.

Thus was the entire traffic of one of the principal transcontinental lines absolutely stopped, and a line which for years has handled some 75 per cent of the through traffic from New York, Boston, and other Eastern seaboard points to California was compelled to abandon its trains, send its ships to ports without adequate facilities to handle its business, close down its shops, and allow the grass to grow upon its tracks, all because a 12-year old boy at Beaumont was sick and the health officer of the great State of Texas thought he had a case suspicious of yellow fever.

The arbitrary action of the Texas authorities was quickly followed by similar action on the part of Calcasieu Parish and other western Louisiana points.

Meanwhile the condition of affairs along the line had become so burdensome and objectionable to the more conservative people that a conference between the health authorities of the Louisiana towns was suggested. Dr. Carter, of the Marine-Hospital Service, Dr. Guiteras, the Government yellow-fever expert, and Dr. Olliphant, president of the Louisiana Board of Health, were invited to attend, as was also Dr. Swearingen, of the Texas board. A special train was furnished by this company, which left Algiers on the morning of September 29, picking up the doctors at the different points on the line. This train on reaching Rayne, in the parish of Acadia, was stopped by an armed mob and prevented from proceeding further, notwithstanding the fact that authority was given for it to pass through the day before the outrage occurred.

These events were followed in a few days by the appearance of fever (pronounced later by Dr. Guiteras to be yellow fever) at Galveston and also at Houston, and at once there was another avalanche of quarantine restrictions, not only in Louisiana, but also over all Texas. The health authorities of these cities, however, in a short while passed a resolution that no yellow fever existed, and Texas quarantines against them were generally raised. Not so with Louisiana towns, however. Lake Charles, with two outlets to the North still open, maintained her embargo against the Southern Pacific, and with other points declined to allow trains to pass in either direction.

A merchant of Crowley, La., had a carload of rice sacks from some Northern point shipped to Lake Charles. The Southern Pacific was asked as a favor (as it could run no trains) to haul the car with switch engine to Crowley. This they agreed to do, but Calcasieu and Lake Charles authorities would not permit it, though they did allow this same car to be hauled by wagon by a resident of Lake Charles to the Mermentau River, at a cost of $140—considerably more than it cost to bring it hundreds of miles to Lake Charles.

With the assistance of the fumigation plans adopted by the United States Marine-Hospital Service and through the efficient cooperation of Dr. Carter and his assistants, this company was enabled through all these troublous times, to run a mixed train between New Orleans and St. Martinsville and handle the mails and many classes of freights, after fumigation.

From St. Martinsville to Alexandria and the Sabine River, however, traffic of all kinds was practically abandoned. This condition of affairs continued until an accumulation of freight from California for New Orleans at Houston on October 20 induced the railroad officials to apply to Texas health authorities for permission to bring the freight east to destination.

This was consented to with the proviso that no loaded cars of any description could move west, but the railroad would be allowed to move empty cars west if they would stop them at Sabine River and fumigate to the satisfaction of the Texas authorities. This was agreed to by the railroad, and whilst the authorities of Calcasieu Parish were not unwilling to this arrangement, some of the citizens of Lake Charles called a mass meeting, which declared that that town must be the eastern terminus of the Southern Pacific Company, and to make the declaration more emphatic the same night a trestle bridge just east of there was burned, conveying the hint of further destruction of property unless their demands were complied with.

On October 27 the objections at Lake Charles were removed and permission given to handle loaded cars east and empties west after fumigation. On October 30 they again objected, and this state of affairs continued until November 10, when the railroad was permitted to move a few cars east bound. On November 12 Houston raised its quarantine unconditionally, and on November 15 the State of Texas took similar action; and it was not until about this time that the Lake Charles authorities, realizing that they could no longer maintain their absurd commercial quarantine restrictions, amended them to some extent, and a limited amount of traffic was resumed.

It was not until November 25, however, that all through freight and passenger traffic was resumed, and several weeks afterwards before restrictions covering local freight to Louisiana points were entirely abrogated.

The business of the Southern Pacific Company was thus interrupted from September 7, and a great part of the time entirely stopped in portions of Texas and Louisiana, until November 25, a period of eighty days, during which time the company actually lost the sum of $1,118,112.61.

In addition to this actual loss, as compared with the same period last year, up to September 15, the company's traffic had shown a very gratifying increase, and the outlook for a further increase was bright. The loss from the prospective increase, as well as the enormous increase in the expense of handling freight via Galvestion, due to the inadequate facilities and high charges of that port, made the real loss not less than $1,500,000, besides having the bulk of its through business to and from California and other Western points diverted to its Northern competitors, who were not affected by quarantine restrictions. Most of this traffic it will take years to regain, and some of it has been lost forever.

There is not the shadow of a doubt that the quarantine restrictions of many towns and cities during the prevalence of this fever were more of a commercial than a health measure. I have made careful inquiry at the principal points on this company's line and I am reliably informed that the necessaries of life were advanced to consumers from 10 to 50 per cent. To cite one instance of many: A merchant at Crowley says he paid 8 cents per can for baking powder at wholesale at Lake Charles that he sold himself at retail before quarantine at 5 cents per can; sugar advanced 25 per cent at the same point. These advances were general from St. Martinsville to Cheneyville and Lake Charles.

In this lengthy letter I have given you a record of the principal events as they occurred from day to day and such information as it seems to me will be of service.

These facts are given for your own use, as you can understand we can not afford to publicly criticise the action of the people in a matter of this kind, and we really have no fault to find with local quarantine restrictions imposed to protect the health of the people, but restrictions imposed for commercial purposes, and those which prevent the handling of through traffic, are unwarranted acts of tyranny which there should be some power to prevent.

Wishing you success with your admirable measure, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

T. FAY, Manager's Assistant.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., December 21, 1897.

MY DEAR SIR: In writing you on quarantine matters on the 18th instant, I failed to give you the facts about the effect the quarantine restrictions had on steamship business to Florida ports, which ports, while practically open to Habana at all times, were closed to traffic by steamers from New Orleans during the prevalence of the yellow fever here. One of the strongest reasons for placing quarantine regulations under the control of the National Government is illustrated by the action of the health authorities of Florida, who permit the free entrance of steamers from Habana throughout the year.

The distance from Habana to Key West is only about 90 miles and is easily made by fast steamers in six or seven hours. After landing passengers and freight at Key West they proceed to Port Tampa, which is reached in twenty-four hours after leaving Habana. The ships in this trade belong to the Plant Line, carry a large number of passengers, and in connection with the rail lines in southern Florida form the quickest route between New York and other Eastern points and Habana. On arrival at Port Tampa passengers take the trains at once and are soon distributed throughout the country, some coming to New Orleans and other points along the Gulf. You can understand how extremely difficult it would be to trace such passengers after they leave Port Tampa or determine whether or not during the summer months they do not communicate yellow fever to those with whom they happen to come in contact on trains or after they reach their destination.

These steamers are allowed to maintain this open intercourse with such a constantly infected port as Habana on the ground that they enter that port in the morning and leave again before sundown, and that the crews are not allowed to go ashore, yet it is a known fact that captains and pursers, both of whom have necessary business to attend to on shore, invariably land, and the ship whilst at anchor is receiving and unloading freight and supplies, with boatmen and laborers coming and going between it and the shore. It is claimed passengers are only allowed on board after an examination is made as to their health, previous residence, etc., by a physician, but it can be appreciated how extremely unreliable such an examination is when in many cases the physician can only accept the mere statement of passengers in the premises.

In connection with this subject I inclose you a clipping from the Times-Democrat of yesterday which may be of interest. There is no way to prevent such methods as outlined in the report in the Times, except by placing the entire control of quarantine matters under the United States Government, as such authority would not maintain the present efficient quarantine in the Mississippi River and at the same time allow the notoriously inefficient quarantines at Florida and the other Gulf ports. There are many persons in this section who attribute the origin of the yellow fever at Ocean Springs during the past summer to passengers who came to that point from Habana to Tampa by ship and thence by rail.

Nearly every trip these steamers had aboard refugees from the Island of Cuba, who scattered all over the South, many coming to New Orleans, Mobile, and the Lake Shore points. The quarantine at Mobile has also been notoriously lax, that port having been so anxious to encourage the fruit trade from Central America that they have allowed steamships to arrive and unload without any detention; yet it is well known that there had been more or less fever at many of the Central American ports during the past summer.

As long as quarantine regulations are under the control of the local and State authorities there will never be any certainty of this section of the country escaping the importation of yellow fever. What is needed, in the first place, is a quarantine which will prevent the importation of the fever, and, in the second place, to have such restrictions uniformly and impartially enforced at all ports, especially south of Cape Hatteras, as north of that point the fever, though occasionally imported, has not spread for many years. There is no other country in the world where such a condition of affairs as existed in our section during the months of September, October, and November would have been possible.

Every State, county, parish, and town had its own ideas of quarantine, and in most cases they seemed to work on a different basis. In some instances, where the duly constituted authorities imposed reasonable restrictions, their orders were nullified by action of mobs. No assistance was given by either the State or General Governments toward an amelioration of the condition of affairs, and even the United States mail was at the mercy of petty local authorities, who in many cases refused it passage for months.

Had such a law as you propose been in effect, the condition of affairs would have been entirely different. In the first place, the fever would never have been imported, and if it had found lodgment here, no such ruin to commercial interests as occurred would have been possible. Whilst local communities could have taken the necessary action to protect the health of their people, they would not have had the power to prevent the passage of through trains which do not stop, and through freights, mail, and express, as well as passengers, would have been handled with entire safety.

The railroads could have arranged to change their crews at isolated and properly guarded points and put on other crews who had not been exposed to infection, thus doing away with every possible danger of spreading the disease and throwing around the handling of their through business all necessary safeguards to protect the health of the communities through which they pass.

Yours, truly,

T. FAY.

[Queen and Crescent Route. New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad Company; Alabama and Vicksburg Railway Company; Vicksburg, Shreveport and Pacific Railroad Company. C. C. Harvey, president and general manager.]

NEW ORLEANS, LA., December 23, 1897.

DEAR SIR: I have received from the Southern Pacific Company copy of your letter of the 10th instant addressed to Mr. Owen, and with reference thereto I beg to say that traffic arrangements on these lines were most seriously interrupted by yellow fever quarantine, and nearly every town and corporation issued different regulations, often in conflict with the regulations issued by the State authorities, which complicated matters very seriously.

Many of these regulations were, no doubt, issued for the sole purpose of keeping out yellow fever, although unnecessarily stringent according to the views of experts, but there can be no doubt, I think, that several towns quarantined against other towns in the hope of securing business.

On the line of the New Orleans and Northeastern road we managed to keep freight trains running and handled certain classes of business, but we had to discontinue running local trains, as for many weeks no passengers were allowed to go from one town to another along the line, and only a few trains were therefore run to accommodate through business.

To do this we had to run a local service between New Orleans and Slidell (28 miles), where there was a quarantine station. Passengers there changed into another train, with a separate crew, and were taken 3 miles out of Meridian to another camp, and, after examination, the trains were allowed to go north through Meridian, no passengers or any members of the train crews being allowed to alight at Meridian.

On the Alabama and Vicksburg and Vicksburg, Shreveport and Pacific roads the passenger and freight trains were annulled for many days, the people along those lines positively declining to allow any train service, and near Jackson a trestle was burned and track torn up by people from Jackson, owing to a misunderstanding between the State authorities and the superintendent as to the regulations under which the trains could be run. The regulations issued by the authorities covered an excessive rate of speed through the town and across other railroad tracks to which it would have been dangerous for the company to conform.

The loss on traffic from the 15th of September to the 31st of October, 1897, entirely owing to quarantine restrictions, amounted to $128,500, being a falling off of 35 per cent as compared with the corresponding period of the previous year. There was also a continued loss in passenger business during November, but the freight traffic held up.

It seems to me very necessary that there should be uniformity in the quarantine restrictions and that these regulations should be prepared by persons having knowledge of how yellow fever is spread, and that local authorities should not have the power to stop through railroad traffic, and their regulations in local matters should, I think, be confined within the lines prepared by higher authorities.

If you would like further details, I shall be pleased to furnish you with the same.

Yours, truly,

C. C. HARVEY,
President and General Manager.

[Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, New Orleans and Mobile Division.]

NEW ORLEANS, LA., January 17, 1898.

DEAR SIR: A copy of your letter of December 10 has been handed me by Superintendent Owen, of the Southern Pacific Railroad. I have been prevented by pressure of affairs from writing you earlier.

I would say that while this line suffered greatly by the epidemic, we did not experience the difficulties in dealing with the quarantine regulations as did some of the other lines. The territory through which my division runs was for the most part "infected;" hence our people were the "quarantined" rather than "quarantiners." However, there were quarantine regulations enough everywhere along the line.

In some instances quarantine was apparently maintained to conceal the fact that there was fever in the places. Many of the circumstances were equally as eccentric. There are in Mississippi three different bodies in each county with the power to establish quarantines, without counting the "shotgun" element. For the want of uniformity it was impossible almost to keep track of the regulations. The officials themselves, in some instances, were ignorant of their relations to each other. I know of an instance of a body forgetting its own orders. We got permission from all the proper authorities to forward a carload of grain (or fertilizer) originating in the North to a small station in Mississippi, but on arrival one or two people in the vicinity prevented its delivery to the owner.

The Harrison County (Miss.) quarantine guards prevented for a time small vessels from passing through the Bay St. Louis drawbridge, which were loaded in Mississippi Sound and destined to the town of Bay St. Louis, which, as you know, is situated on the south shore of the bay. The drawbridge is toward the north shore of the bay of St. Louis, and said to be within Harrison County. These vessels were not working contrary to any quarantine regulations, and, I believe, were operating at the request of the town authorities of Bay St. Louis to afford employment to the people, who would otherwise be dependent upon public charity.

I mention these cases as examples. I would mention another peculiarity of the quarantine. Places maintained strict quarantine after they had become "infected" themselves. The cities of New Orleans and Mobile did so. The explanation was that these cities were spending large sums of money in isolating the foci of infection, hence the necessity to keep out new foci. But the failure of the physicians to report cases destroyed any chance to stamp out the disease by such efforts.

It seems to be an acknowledged fact that only a small proportion of the cases were reported. Still, it may be proper to isolate only one focus, if no more, in the midst of an epidemic. No telling how much spread might take place from the one focus. It may therefore have been right for an infected place to maintain quarantine against another, but it looks unreasonable.

Respectfully,

C. MARSHALL, Superintendent.

[Illinois Central Railroad Company.]

CHICAGO, December 31, 1897.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of 10th instant, addressed to Mr. Owen, superintendent of the Southern Pacific Company at New Orleans, advising that you have introduced a bill in the United States Senate providing for national quarantine over interstate commerce and travel, and asking for information which will aid you in establishing the utility of such a law.

In reply to your first inquiry as to how long trains of our road were stopped during the late epidemic, I beg to advise that through passenger-train service on the Illinois Central Railroad, between New Orleans and Chicago and New Orleans and Louisville, was not interrupted at any time, but we were compelled to take off a number of our local passenger trains on account of the rigid and varying quarantine regulations, which effectually prevented local travel.

On both the Illinois Central and the Yazoo and Mississippi Valley Railroad as well through freight-train service between New Orleans and points in the North was not seriously impeded, but the local freight service in Louisiana and Mississippi was greatly hampered through quarantine regulations which prevented the handling of many classes of freight from districts alleged to be infected.

In reply to your second question, I will state that the period of greater or less interference with traffic by quarantine regulations may be set at sixty days from, say, September 6 to the early part of November.

In reply to your third inquiry, will state that quarantine regulations were made by municipal, county, and State authorities.

In reply to your fourth inquiry, will state that we have made no estimate as to the loss sustained by either the Illinois Central or the Yazoo and Mississippi Valley companies.

The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;" that is to say, all commerce, foreign and domestic.

It would be no stretch of this power to have the Federal Government control quarantine at all interior points, as well as at the seaboard, and obviously a uniform and efficient quarantine should be adopted, which, owing to diversity of local interests, sectional jealousies, and other causes, can not be maintained except under Federal authority, as is abundantly shown by the experience in this and in other previous visitations of yellow fever and other forms of epidemic diseases.

The matter should be considered from a national standpoint, and in the interest of every State and every one of our seventy-odd million citizens. The question should not be looked at from a Southern point of view alone, as there are other contagious diseases of greater virulence than yellow fever which may come in through our other boundaries on the North Atlantic seaboard, on the Great Lakes, or from Canada, or Mexico.

We have a certain safeguard against yellow fever—that it is not indigenous anywhere in the United States—while other diseases, like typhoid, typhus, diphtheria, etc., do originate within our borders.

It seems to me, therefore, that the Federal Government should take the whole question of quarantine, as affecting commerce, into its control and enact and enforce laws which, while adequately protecting the public health, shall admit of commerce being carried on without subjecting it, as heretofore, to purely local and in many cases utterly inefficient and unnecessary restrictions.

Yours, truly,

J. T. HARAHAN,
Second Vice-President.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

APPENDIX F.

Maritime quarantine unquestionably can prevent the introduction of infectious disease. It is not necessary to quote authority for this—certainly not in America, where it is universally held and all quarantine practice based on it.

The aim is to allow no infected vessel or person to come to entry. It is in two parts:

1. Measures to prevent infection of the vessel in the foreign port, or there cleanse it, so that it comes clean to our quarantine stations.

2. Measures of disinfection and quarantine at our quarantine stations of such vessels as report there infected.

The first is only possible to the United States, and is especially advocated by American sanitarians—Billings and Holt, of Louisiana; Bell, of New York; Woods and Ranch, of Illinois, and others—the resolutions of the Montgomery conference of 1889 and the Mobile conference of 1897 (see below), at both of which conferences the resolutions were carried unanimously.

A resolution looking toward the sanitary inspection and sanitation of foreign ports that menace us most and to the establishment of a system of international quarantine.

Resolved, First. That the Congress of the United States be requested to authorize the President to take such steps, by treaty or otherwise, as may aid in inducing the respective governments of the intertropical American ports to secure proper and adequate sanitation, together with the adoption by them of such restrictive measures as may be necessary to render such ports in good sanitary condition and to prevent the introduction of yellow fever.

Second. To provide for the maintenance of a medical force of this country in each such port to give warning of the existence of yellow fever therein.

with adequate power for the most efficient possible prevention of the communication of the disease therefrom; and that Congress be memorialized to make such appropriation as may be necessary to maintain a proper medical-inspection service in intertropical American ports of sufficient importance to warrant such appointment.

Third. That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to make a suitable appropriation and provide for the early calling of a conference of port sanitary authorities to deal with the subject of international quarantine and preventive sanitary regulations.

Respectfully submitted by—

JOHN B. HAMILTON,
S. R. OLLIPHANT,
H. R. CARTER,
R. P. DANIEL,
P. J. HAMILTON,
Committee.

The efficiency of this foreign work is well shown by the small number (2) of infected vessels arriving at United States quarantine stations during the cholera epidemic of 1893, the most widely spread epidemic ever known, and the only widespread European epidemic which did not spread to the United States. During this year officers of the United States were stationed in foreign ports and carried out measures of disinfection and quarantine to prevent the infection of these vessels. Commerce this year with cholera-infected ports was not interrupted.

That maritime quarantine at stations in the United States can prevent the introduction of disease is shown by the history of the Southern cities, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, and New Orleans, which, since the institution of proper quarantine about a score of years ago, have escaped visitations of yellow fever for from nineteen to twenty-one years, prior to which time it was common in all and of almost yearly occurrence in the first and last. Every sanitarian in the South, except Dr. le Hardy, of Savannah, relies absolutely on the efficiency of maritime quarantine to prevent the introduction of yellow fever.

That proper sanitary measures can, in general, prevent an epidemic of yellow fever if the earlier cases be discovered is also the belief of all or nearly all sanitarians.

Jerome Cochran, of Alabama, a sanitarian of highest authority on yellow fever, submitted to the Montgomery conference the proposition: "When a few cases of yellow fever occur in a community * * * it is generally possible by the employment of proper sanitary measures to prevent the development of an epidemic," which proposition was, after full discussion, adopted by the conference, which contained almost every sanitarian in the United States having practical knowledge of yellow fever.

The experience this year at Franklin, La., as well as at Baton Rouge, La., and at Perkinston, Cayuga, and Clinton, Miss., shows the truth of this most beautifully (especially if it be compared with towns where no such means were taken). The fever in all these towns was suppressed by the means taken. In Edwards, while not suppressed, it was absolutely confined to the cordon. No fever spread out of the "infected district" during the Brunswick epidemic. During this epidemic commerce through Jessup, in the infected district, was carried on without let or hindrance, and that with Brunswick with little interference, in both cases without conveying infection.

Porter, of Florida, may be quoted as inculcating the safety of commerce from a place infected with yellow fever, carried on under proper supervision, as may the late Jerome Cochran and the no less eminent Dr. Thornton, of Memphis, and this principle was agreed to in practice in 1897 by the State boards of Mississippi and Tennessee. In fact, not a few sanitarians hold—among whom I may again quote Cochran and Thornton—that commerce under careful regulation is safer than regulations of absolute nonintercourse, if the latter are to be kept up for any length of time, as it has been found well-nigh impossible to prevent some smuggling in of persons or things if no legitimate means of communication is allowed, and the danger from even a very small amount of unregulated communication is greater than much carried on under sanitary supervision.

The experience of 1897 is in point. Alabama towns almost universally had a quarantine of nonintercourse with infected points, and yellow fever was reported in nine of them (not counting Mobile). In Louisiana the towns east of Arcadia Parish, with few exceptions, allowed commerce with New Orleans, and in only two—and one of these Baton Rouge, a nonintercourse town—did fever develop. Nor did any fever develop in any of the Mississippi towns, which allowed commerce (under United States supervision) with New Orleans.

During the Brunswick fever the pratique of the United States for persons and commerce was taken without the slightest friction by Savannah, Macon, Augusta, and all other towns in Georgia, and by the State boards of Florida and South Carolina.

APPENDIX G.

ANSWER TO OBJECTION TO MANDATORY PRATIQUE.

The provision of the proposed act, by which a vessel, after proper disinfection at a United States quarantine station, is pronounced free to enter port, "shall be admitted to entry" on the certificate of the United States quarantine officer—to which Mr. MALLORY so objects—has already been in force for five years, being provided for in the act of February 15, 1893, section 6.

In the preamble of the United States Quarantine Regulations now in force, however, we find the following (page 9, paragraph 7):

> Vessels having been treated at national quarantine stations that are located a considerable distance from the ports of entry of said vessels may be inspected by the local quarantine officer, and if for any sanitary reason it is considered inadvisable to admit the vessel, he should report the facts immediately to the Supervising Surgeon-General, Marine-Hospital Service, detaining the vessel pending his action.

This shows that there is no disposition to object on the part of the United States quarantine authorities to the inspection of their work by local quarantine officers. It is rather invited.

This provision of the act of 1893—the "mandatory pratique" of maritime quarantine—has been operative five years, and this second inspection has been made under this paragraph of regulations by local quarantine officers during the whole of that time, and there has no single case occurred in which there has been any complaint by local quarantine officers of its action.

This mandatory pratique, however, was not without its use. At not a few ports in the South—the Gulf especially—quarantine was sometimes administered for other than sanitary reasons—for the fees of ballast and disinfection, from jealousy between stations, etc.—and this power was needed to prevent this unnecessary quarantine of clean ships, and needed for that purpose alone. The history of its operation for five years, and the paragraph of the United States Quarantine Regulations quoted, shows that it has never been used, or intended to be used, to force a vessel on a quarantine officer objecting to its entry in good faith.

Nor is quarantine for commercial purposes a rarity on land. This disinfection of clean vessels was mainly at the smaller ports. Vessels from South Africa—Cape Town, Port Algoa, and Port Elizabeth—were habitually quarantined for yellow fever at Pascagoula. At these ports there has never been a case of yellow fever. For instance the bark Castilla, disinfected at Chandeleur in 1890 by steam and every modern appliance, was quarantined at Round Island, Miss., and some sulphur burned in pots in her hold, and the disinfection fee collected; the quarantine officer at Round Island stating in a letter that he regarded the process as "unnecessary and inefficacious," but he was directed to do it.

Other cases have occurred at the same quarantine and similar ones at Apalachicola, and in the same line was the compulsory removal of disinfected rock ballast at the Pensacola quarantine, for which fees were charged, now discontinued by the Florida State board. At this time the same vessels were allowed entry into the larger ports—New Orleans, Mobile, Tampa, Savannah, and Charleston—without quarantine.

APPENDIX H.

Letter from Dr. White, in charge of immigration bureau, Ellis Island, N. Y.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING SURGEON-GENERAL
MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1898.

DEAR DOCTOR: Referring to my conversation with you last night, and to the fact that Senators CAFFERY and FRYE both seemed interested in the matter, I submit the following statement of facts.

The Marine-Hospital Service assumed control of Brunswick (Ga.) quarantine in the summer of 1893, and of the epidemic of yellow fever already inplanted there prior to that time.

So well was the service work done in both sea and land quarantine that all Georgia cities and towns accepted the pratique of both classes, business went on with a minimum of hindrance, and not one solitary hint ever emanated from any person that any infection was carried to any place outside our lines. Savannah, the most prominent commercial seaport of the Southeast, was so well pleased as to request, on or about July 1, 1894, after one year's observation of the work, that we should take over and assume full charge of her local quarantine. You are in position to supply the proof of this offer.

None of the local quarantines in Georgia or South Carolina dare handle infected ships, but send every one of such to the national station at Sapelo Sound, thus contradicting any statement that they do not rely upon the Marine-Hospital Service, and, indeed, with rare exceptions, this applies to the whole Southern coast. Nearly all of them send vessels to national quarantines, and maintain only what are properly inspection stations.

Before the mandatory law of 1893 many of these local stations, as Surgeon Carter has told you, made pretense of disinfection and collected fees therefor after vessels were released by our stations and needed no further treatment. This was done in Savannah in 1886, and only stopped by my threatening the health officer of Savannah with a recommendation for discontinuance of our ignored station. The health officer's back-down then showed conclusively whose work was trusted, even at that early date.

Very respectfully,

J. H. WHITE.

Dr. WALTER WYMAN,
Supervising Surgeon-General, M. H. S.

APPENDIX I.

Correspondence touching transfer of Savannah Quarantine Station to Marine-Hospital Service.

CITY OF SAVANNAH, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
June 29, 1894.

SIR: I am directed by Mayor McDonough to say that, by resolution of city council, a committee will wait on you, at your convenience, to arrange for the transfer of the quarantine service of this city to the National Government.

He desires me to say that it is not a question of selling our plant, but to ascertain from you the policy of the service, etc.

This committee will report back to city council, who will then take action in the matter. The committee will be in Washington on Friday, July 6, if in answer to this letter you express a desire to confer with them on that date.

Very respectfully,

W. F. BRUNNER, Health Officer.

Surg. Gen. WALTER WYMAN,
United States Marine-Hospital Service,
Washington, D. C.

CITY OF SAVANNAH, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
July 27, 1894.

DEAR DOCTOR: Things are getting very interesting in this city on the quarantine question. The Morning News and Evening Dispatch have favored national control, while the Press has fought it persistently in its local and editorial columns. Ex-Senator Norwood and Dr. Le Hardy have come out in the latter paper denouncing the movement, hinting at centralization of power, etc. Finding that this maudlin statement was having some effect, I went to-day to Mayor McDonough and advised that he send the committee to Washington within the next few days.

He has advised me if you will be ready to meet the committee on Monday, July 2. I would earnestly urge that you act quickly. I will be in the party which leaves here on Sunday, if I receive a favorable answer. Let me know by wire as soon as you get this, which will be Friday morning at the latest. I have assured them that your service will take charge of our quarantine.

The city authorities have a great deal of confidence in Joe White, and I would suggest that you have him in Washington with the committee. I would again say that delay in this matter is dangerous.

Yours, truly,

W. F. BRUNNER.

SAVANNAH, GA., June 21, 1894.

DEAR DOCTOR: City council acted on the quarantine matter yesterday to the extent of passing a resolution appointing committee of three "to confer with the proper Government authorities in regard to having the National Government take charge of Savannah's quarantine station through the Marine-Hospital Service."

Vote stood 8 to 2 in favor of. If the Government will give the city anything like a fair sum, the matter is settled.

Dr. Graham, who you know is engaged by the city at a salary of $2,000 per annum, and I feel a moral obligation to request of you, should the change be made, that you keep him in charge until January 1. You have met him; Carter, Murray, and White know of his work, and I feel that I am not asking too much when I ask this.

With sincere regards, yours,

W. F. BRUNNER.

CITY OF CHARLESTON, S. C.,
DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
Thursday, June 21, 1894.

DEAR DOCTOR: Mr. McGee, chairman of our maritime sanitation committee, and I desire to have a conference with you as to quarantine matters on next Tuesday, June 26, in Washington.

Will you please telegraph, on the receipt of this note, if it will suit you for us to meet you on that day.

Respectfully,

H. B. HORLBECK, Secretary.

Dr. WALTER WYMAN,
Supervising Surgeon-General Marine-Hospital Service,

CITY OF SAVANNAH, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
June 27, 1894.

SIR: I am requested by Mayor McDonough to state that a committee from city council of this city wishes to confer with you in reference to turning over to your service the control of our maritime quarantine station.

If agreeable, the committee will reach Washington on Monday morning, July 2.

I would ask that you kindly wire me your answer as soon as you receive this communication, in order that the members of the committee can arrange for the trip.

Very respectfully,

W. F. BRUNNER, Health Officer.

Surg. Gen. WALTER WYMAN,
United States Marine Hospital Service,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is unfortunate that the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] who has charge of this bill has been ill for some time and is ill at present. I have reason to believe, certainly to hope, that he may be able to be in the Senate to-morrow. As a member of the committee reporting the bill I have intended to express some views concerning it in its favor, but other matters have so crowded upon my attention that I am not quite ready to proceed. I would like to take the floor at this time with the understanding that I shall be permitted to-morrow, when the bill is again before the Senate, to occupy a little time in the advocacy of the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The pending question is the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Mr. GALLINGER. So I understand. As several Senators have expressed a desire to have an executive session, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to withdraw that motion a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of executive business is withdrawn.

GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the Alaska bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3729) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska.

Mr. CARTER. Owing to the constitutional question raised in the course of the consideration of the amendment presented by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] and the fact that that proposition should receive very careful consideration to avoid a hasty disposition of a matter of such supreme importance, the Senator from California consents to the withdrawal of his amendment, providing the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw the motion to recommit, which will remove all objection to the passage of the bill, it having been disposed of completely except as to this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. PERKINS. I withdraw my amendment for the reason that there are many measures and thoughts of the pending bill that are of most vital importance to the people of Alaska, who are in a great degree without laws governing that District. I believe the amendment I have offered is in the interest of good government and good morals and in the interest of temperance, yet the constitutional question having arisen, I do not feel that it is proper for me to place the bill in jeopardy by pressing the amendment. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very much gratified that the Senator from California has taken this action. In view of that fact I will cheerfully withdraw my motion to recommit and will also temporarily withhold my motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, that the Alaska bill may be disposed of, if it can be done within a reasonable time.

Mr. CARTER. There is no further amendment to be offered by the committee, and all the committee amendments have been passed upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no further amendment be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1330) granting a pension to Sophia J. Chilcott;

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 30, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock M. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I offer as a matter of privilege the following resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, a question of order. Before consideration is given to that resolution is not the first thing in order final action upon the bill the House already has under consideration?

Mr. BAILEY. This is also a privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. No; the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, consideration might be given to the resolution; however, I shall not make any question——

Mr. BLAND. I think, Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to have the resolution read to see whether it is privileged or not. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Speaker to hand back to the Clerk the resolution which I sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that we have order in the House before we proceed.

CLAIMS UNDER THE BOWMAN ACT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4936) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies, reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine.

CUBA.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rose to present a question of privilege; I have presented it to the House, and the Chair, without having it read, recognizes the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is recognized, and pending that the gentleman from Texas states that he rises to a privileged motion.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution which I offer.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the heroic struggle of the Cuban people against the force of arms and the horrors of famine has shown them worthy to be free. And——

[Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, and those in the galleries will maintain order. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

Second. The United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as a free and independent State.

[Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not in order. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, upon that I desire to be heard. I desire to say in the beginning——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, is debate in order?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a privileged question.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no desire to precipitate any disorder in the House, and have no desire to create a scene. The subject is too serious and the crisis is too grave for such conduct. I believe, however, I have presented a motion which is permissible under the rules.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. A point of order, Mr. Speaker!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana (continuing). The gentleman from Texas has stated it right. This is a serious subject, and I suggest that we have perfect order, to the end that we can hear everything that is said.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, and gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe, Mr. Speaker, I have presented a matter which under the rules of the House I have a right to present. The question of my right involved in the point of order submitted by the gentleman from Maine is one for the Speaker first to determine, and after the Speaker then the House. It is within the power of the majority, if they believe I have no such right, to determine it adversely. All we ask upon this side is that it shall be determined properly and in order, leaving the responsibility with the majority, for the minority is more than willing to meet their responsibility.

This very question has arisen twice in the House of Representatives; one time it was decided that a resolution of this character is not only privileged, but is to be disposed of at once. It arose again in the Fifty-third Congress, when the Speaker of that House held that it was privileged, but held that notwithstanding the fact that it was privileged, it must be referred to the proper committee. The RECORD shows that when the Speaker made that ruling, it was upon a point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. McCreary, upon a resolution presented by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] himself. [Applause.]

In that Congress he insisted that this resolution, or a resolution similar to this one, was not only privileged, but it was the right of the House to dispose of it at once. The Speaker of the House held with the gentleman from Maine that it was privileged, but held against him that it must be first referred to a committee of the House.

But the Speaker, in making that very decision, admitted that there was a decision to the contrary which had been rendered by a former Speaker. There being, then, two decisions, it is fair to say that this is an open question, and I venture to say the reason is with that decision which holds that a privileged question is before the House for its disposition whenever presented. Any other rule practically destroys the privilege of the question, because if you present a privileged question and it must under the rules be referred to a committee, that committee can effectually bury the question of privilege, as it has buried resolutions similar to this one for the last twelve months, and therefore nothing could be gained by presenting a resolution that was privileged if the ruling of the Speaker of the Fifty-third Congress is to be followed.

But it is not necessary for me to argue that question. Upon that decision by the Speaker the gentleman from Maine promptly entered an appeal, which the gentleman from Kentucky moved to lay upon the table, a procedure which, as every member of this House knows, was a means of determining whether the decision of the Chair was correct or not. Better than all the arguments that I might make would be to read the roll call and show who it was that then held that a resolution of this kind is privileged and subject to the immediate disposition of the House.

I will not read the more than ninety names that are recorded in support of that proposition. There is one weighing more on a question like this than all the others. There is one who sits now in judgment to determine this question; and when the question was then presented and the roll called, whether or not in effect the House should be permitted to proceed with a resolution of this kind, I find recorded in favor of that proposition the name of the present Speaker of the House himself. [Applause.]

I believe that the present occupant of the chair must have thought then that he was correct in that vote; and it remains for him to say whether he will stand up before the country and declare that he voted one way on the floor of the House when he was trying to embarrass a Democratic majority, and will decide another way when he occupies the chair, in order to save a Republican majority from embarrassment which they have invited.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I remember very distinctly the occasion to which the gentleman from Texas alludes. It was a discussion of certain phases of the Hawaiian question. I wrote hastily on my desk here a resolution which in substance declared that certain action taken by the Executive could be properly construed as an infringement upon the war power of Congress. Speaker Crisp at that time ruled that the resolution was a question of privilege. I thought myself when I wrote it that it was a question of privilege. If the then Speaker had considered the matter a little more carefully, he would have avoided a quagmire of difficulties and contradictions in which he involved himself by that ruling, which continued throughout the entire Congress.

It was an erroneous ruling. There was not a parliamentarian on the Democratic side who did not believe that it was an error. I do not think there is a parliamentarian on that side who was then in Congress (and I do not include the gentleman from Texas) who did not admit to me repeatedly that it was a mistake. Speaker Crisp himself, I have no doubt whatever, was convinced that he had made an error in that ruling; and in order to sustain it he was obliged to resort after that to a series of arbitrary rulings that were exceedingly embarrassing to him and his party.

Now, I will tell you just why the ruling was wrong and just where I made my mistake in claiming that it was privileged. The resolution declared that the President had done something which infringed upon the war power of Congress; that Congress had the power to declare war, and therefore the President had infringed upon the privileges of this House. But, Mr. Speaker, a little reflection on my part convinced me, and a little reflection on the part of the gentleman from Texas will probably convince him that the war power, which is held by Congress and not by the House alone, can not involve a question of the privilege of the House.

There is no such thing as a question of "joint privilege" of the House and the Senate. The privilege of the House is governed and limited by the rules of this House, and it can not extend to any action affecting a power which for its exercise requires the conjoint action of both branches of Congress. There is no such thing as the "privilege" of Congress. There is a "privilege" of the Senate under its rules and a "privilege" of the House under its rules. The fault of my hasty assumption, in accusing the President of usurping the war power of Congress and thereby invading the privilege of the House, was in the fact that the power to declare war is not solely the power of the House, but is the joint power of the House and the Senate; and there is no "privilege" of Congress covering the joint rights of the two branches.

I ask a ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I think it hardly necessary for me to say that my sympathies are in the line of the resolution of the gentleman from Texas. But, Mr. Speaker, admitting that this is a question of privilege, it certainly can not be considered a question of higher privilege than the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE]; and in the event of both claiming the floor at the same time, the one receiving recognition would unquestionably have the higher privilege than the other.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe we can have war whenever we want it, and that no possible harm can come in proceeding——

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that we may have order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will suspend. Gentlemen will please take their seats and cease conversation. The House must be in order.

Mr. HULL (resuming when order had been restored). Mr. Speaker, I was saying I believe that this House can declare war whenever the majority of the House desires to do so; but I believe we can proceed in an orderly manner without interfering with the legitimate business of the House, which is equally privileged with the resolution of the gentleman from Texas. Nor do I believe that it is of highest importance to plunge the country into war to-day without debate and without the fullest information.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me right there——

Mr. HULL (continuing). Not only that, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAND. I merely wish to suggest to the gentleman that this is a resolution recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba—not a resolution declaring war or a resolution that necessarily means war in any sense.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, if the resolution falls short of that—and I did not hear it fully read—if it falls short of declaring war, it is not operative, and to my mind it does not present any question of privilege at all.

But the point I wish to make is this, on the two motions: That the motion of the gentleman from Maine was a motion of the highest privilege under the specific rules of the House—the rules created for its guidance and government. That was followed by a recognition given to the gentleman from Texas to submit a resolution as a question of privilege, which resolution, however, presents no privilege higher, most favorably considered, than that presented by the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

As I have already said, I am in favor of this Government intervening at the very earliest date, unless conditions change materially, so that they will insure the liberty of the Cubans and a cessation of the deplorable conditions that prevail in that island at the present time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. HULL. I decline to be interrupted. I am in favor of that principle, and state now and here that I will go as far as any man on this floor for the purpose of preserving the rights of the struggling patriots in their heroic efforts on that island [applause on the Republican side]; and I am in favor of the United States controlling the destinies of this continent and saying to Spain that she must get out of the Western Hemisphere.

But I am not willing, sir, to inject in these proceedings here to-day a proposition to lay aside an appropriation bill for the Navy of the United States [jeers and derisive laughter on the Democratic side], which contains in itself a proviso making this legislation available at once, to allow the gentleman from Texas to come in and make a motion of this character.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman declares that he is ready for armed intervention at any time. I ask the gentleman if he does not know it to be a fact that the representatives of the Cuban people tell us that all they ask is to be recognized in their independence, and that they will do the rest? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that remarks should be confined to the point of order.

Mr. HULL. I would ask the permission of the House to answer the gentleman, although the Chair suggests that the argument should be confined to the point of order. I state to the gentleman, in response to his inquiry, that I do not care what the agents of Cuba want us to do. I want the House to act independently of any outside influence with reference to these matters and do what is best for the honor and the dignity and right of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COLSON. Will the gentleman allow me ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. I have not the floor any longer. I have yielded it.

Mr. TERRY was recognized.

Mr. COLSON. I hope the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. I have not the floor.

Mr. COLSON. I want to ask one question.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, well, take him out in the cloakroom and ask him. [Laughter.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point that when a question of privilege is presented affecting the honor, the dignity, or the rights of the House of Representatives it is a matter not for the decision of the Chair solely, but one that should be submitted by the Chair to the judgment and decision of the House of Representatives itself. That follows as a necessary result from the proposition that this is a question affecting the rights of the House.

It will be recollected, sir, that at the last session of Congress the question was presented by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEWIS] affecting the rights of the House as to whether or not it would have the committees of the House appointed at once. And the Speaker ruled, and very properly ruled, that he would submit that question to the House, inasmuch as it was a question for the House itself to decide.

The rule upon that point I will briefly refer to. It is found on page 488 of the Digest and Manual. It is there stated that—

> Whenever a point of order is made that a matter presented is in violation of the honor, the dignity, or the privileges of the House, it is not a question for the Chair, but for the House itself to determine.

If the House is unduly hampered in the exercise of any of its rights, it is its right to take action for its vindication.

So that any question, whether it is considered in violation of the right or the dignity of the House, or a question affecting the rights or dignity of the House itself, necessarily presents a question for the House itself to determine directly, without being fettered by any ruling of the Chair.

Again, as to the point made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] that a declaration of war, or a declaration in favor of the independence of a foreign country, is not one that the House alone shall pass upon, but is a question for the joint action of the House and the Senate, that point can be readily met by the consideration of the fact that the only way that the House and the Senate can exercise their rights in that regard is for one body or the other to pass upon the question and then submit it to the other.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the Speaker's "reconcentrados" are out of order. We want to hear this debate. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, and the gentleman from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. TERRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the authority upon the question, and I submit, sir, that there can not possibly be a graver question or one affecting more nearly the rights, the dignity, and the honor of the House of Representatives of the American people than a question as to whether or not it shall exercise its constitutional right in a matter involving so much of the honor and dignity of the American people as the question involved in the resolution of the gentleman from Texas.

And I trust, sir, that the Speaker of this House, instead of taking it upon his shoulders to decide this matter, will properly present it to the Representatives of the American people and let them decide whether or not this is a question affecting the rights and the honor of the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas who has offered the resolution insists upon its present consideration upon the ground that it is a privileged resolution, and has cited as his authority for that a resolution that was considered in a previous Congress, introduced by the gentleman from Maine [Mr.

BOUTELLE], the present chairman of the Naval Committee. I have not had the opportunity this morning of examining that resolution, but I was present when it was considered, and my remembrance of it is that it is entirely different and distinct from the resolution that is offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

There are two paramount questions of privilege. The first one is the personal privilege that relates to the member. The second one is a privilege where the dignity of the House has been infringed. Now, as I remember the resolution that was offered in the previous Congress, the gentleman who offered it sought to have it a privileged resolution upon the ground that the Executive of the Government had infringed upon the rights and the privileges of the House, and upon that ground insisted that it was privileged and should be considered. While it was held by some of the members that it was in the nature of a privileged resolution, yet it was sent to the committee and considered there instead of being brought up and considered as the gentleman now proposes to have this resolution considered.

There is a wide distinction between the two. There is no pretense that the resolution that is now presented and just read by the Clerk is anything that affects the personal privilege of any member upon this floor. There is no pretense that that resolution affects the dignity or the character of this House. Its object and its only object——

Mr. TERRY. I will say to the gentleman that it affects the rights of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment. I can not be interrupted. It is simply calling for an expression of opinion from the members of the House as regards the condition of the patriots in Cuba; that and nothing more. Under the rules of this House there is no member who is familiar with parliamentary proceedings, it seems to me, who can hold for a moment that this ranges itself under that class of resolutions that should be properly considered as raising a question of privilege. Under our rules these matters should first be presented to the House and then go to a proper committee and after receiving due consideration there be reported back to the House in regular order and then taken up and considered.

Now, I for one am not willing to be carried off my feet on account of my zeal for the people in Cuba, to override and overrule any of the rules and regulations that have governed this body, and I trust that there is not a Republican member upon this floor, on this proposition, who will fail to stand by the orderly proceedings of the House, and to insist that this resolution, while it speaks for the freedom of Cuba, shall have the same consideration that all other great resolutions receive at the hands of this House.

Mr. COLSON. When?

Mr. HOPKINS. When? I will state to the gentleman when. The House controls this body, and the Speaker has always expressed a willingness to cooperate, and cooperate promptly and heartily, with the prevailing sentiment of the House; and as Republican members here to-day we can not afford to be carried off upon a proposition of this kind and overrule the rules of this House and the precedents that have been established in the past, simply to express our opinion upon a matter that we know within a very brief time will be presented to this House so that every Republican member, instead of resorting to revolutionary tactics, may proceed in a regular way to express his opinion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I rose and addressed the Chair and asked if I might interrupt the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say further that this is not the first resolution of this kind that has been offered within the last few days. Plenty of Republicans have offered resolutions——

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. The point of order is the question.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit a question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to pass upon the question.

Mr. HOPKINS (to Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi). What is your question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, I can not state it until you tell me whether you will allow me to ask it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to pass upon the question. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman has yielded for a question. The gentleman has stated that the House of Representatives can pass upon this question whenever it chooses. The question which I desire to ask is this: If it be true that one resolution of this sort has slumbered in the Committee on Foreign Affairs for six months, will the gentleman from Illinois inform me and the House how the House can have action upon this question?

Mr. HOPKINS. By the action of the members of this House. That is the way it can be done, and that is the way it will be done. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Vote on it now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BAILEY. Do I understand that the Chair is ready to rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BAILEY. Then we are ready to have the ruling. [Cries of "Rule!"]

The SPEAKER. A question of privilege which concerns the House is one which concerns the exercise of its functions in accordance with the principles which govern parliamentary bodies. Every parliamentary body has to have rules for its government; otherwise it would have no government at all; and upon adherence to those rules depends its success as a parliamentary body. The rights of the House, under the Constitution, are in no way to be confounded with the privileges of the House and of every member in it in the sense in which this matter is presented here to-day. Congress has certain powers conferred upon it, and in the exercise of those powers each House is governed by its rules. It is authorized expressly by the Constitution to make rules; and without the authorization of the Constitution it would be at liberty to make rules. These rules are the protection of the rights of the House. Now, it will be noticed in the Constitution—if any gentleman will turn to it—that there are certain powers conferred upon Congress—the power to declare war, the power to legislate for the general welfare, and a series of other enumerated powers. No man up to this date has for an instant pretended or suggested that because the Congress has the right to pass laws upon certain topics, proposals for those laws become questions of privilege—never before, except once, and the Chair will present that decision to the House.

The same language is used with reference to our relations with foreign nations that is used with reference to the creation of the courts of law, and all other power which is concerned. It is a legislative power, and it is exercised under the Constitution by rules adopted by each body. This is the first preliminary idea that we ought to have in regard to this matter. But those propositions in regard to war, or about recognition, or any of those subjects which may or may not be within our purview, do not become questions of privilege at all because we have a right to pass upon them, because that would make everything a question of privilege, and end by making nothing a question of privilege.

Now, let us see what this call upon us is founded on. This is a matter that we should not have given any attention to except in times of interest, not to say excitement. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] some time ago presented to Speaker Crisp a proposition which had in it certain elements charging that the Executive was interfering with some of the rights and privileges of the legislative body. The Speaker ruled that it was a question of privilege; and you will perceive that it is entirely different from the present proposition, has no aspect like it at all, not the faintest resemblance to it; but the Speaker ruled that that was a privileged question. He also ruled that, being a privileged question, it should go to a committee.

Well, now, against that doctrine the Chair has always opposed himself; and the question, as members will see by turning to the RECORD, that was put to the House was on that part of the Speaker's decision as to whether it should go to a committee or not, and if it appears that, as the gentleman from Texas says, I voted on that subject, I voted according to my lights and voted against it. But he has omitted to state to you this other question, the same question almost, was put afterwards to Speaker Crisp, and by him promptly decided to be out of order at a later day, on the 30th of July, 1894:

2. That the Republic of Hawaii is entitled to exercise and enjoy international comity and the benefits of all rights, privileges, and advantages under existing treaties that were concluded between the United States of America and the late Kingdom of Hawaii.

3. That the Republic of Hawaii is hereby recognized by the United States of America as a free, sovereign, and independent republic, and the President of the United States shall give proper notice of the recognition to the President of the Republic of Hawaii.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] demanded its immediate consideration as presenting a privileged question; and the gentleman from Missouri, an old and experienced member [Mr. DOCKERY], made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Well, now, as a matter of course, the Speaker sustained the point—and that is precisely this question.

Mr. BAILEY. May I inquire of the Chair if there was any appeal taken on the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. There was no appeal. It was too clear for an appeal even. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. Then I desire to say, in response to that suggestion of the Speaker, that the other decision of Speaker Crisp distinctly held that the resolution was privileged where it related to foreign nations, and that is a part of his decision given to the House.

The SPEAKER. That decision did not overrule his original decision, which the Chair has submitted to the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. May I call the Chair's attention to the previous ruling, to which the Chair has already referred and which I have already stated to the House:

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. The Chair is not entirely clear on the subject——

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the Chair will permit me one moment——

The SPEAKER (continuing). But the Chair will resolve the doubt in favor of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], and will hold that this is a question of privilege, and refer it, under the point made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He ruled rather reluctantly.

The SPEAKER. But on the similar resolution he ruled promptly, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri, an old and experienced member. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BAILEY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I move that the appeal be laid upon the table.

Mr. HENDERSON. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not rise, Mr. Speaker, because——

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not take advantage of the fact that the gentleman was not prompt in relation to his rights.

Mr. BAILEY. I was not prompt because, on account of the confusion on the floor, I did not hear the Speaker decide the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have stated, had he not supposed that the result was acquiesced in, that as far as any question arising out of this matter is concerned, the Chair has not the slightest doubt that the wisdom of the House, which has always been able to arrive at important questions in a suitable way, will get at them now, and at a speedy time for the occasion. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BAILEY. In reply to that suggestion—which, of course, is not a part of the decision—I understand that it was made by the Speaker to hold his political friends on this roll call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine moves that the appeal be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY) there were—ayes 178, noes 137.

Mr. BAILEY. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 180, nays 140, answered "present" 1, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—180.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. McCALL with Mr. STRAIT.

Mr. HITT with Mr. BERRY.

Mr. WANGER with Mr. BROUSSARD.

For this day:

Mr. WARD with Mr. JONES of Virginia.

Mr. BELDEN with Mr. VANDIVER.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts with Mr. McALEER.

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. BROSIUS with Mr. BENNER of Pennsylvania.

Mr. ADAMS with Mr. CASTLE.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas with Mr. BREWER.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I voted in the negative. I should be recorded as present. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HITT.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that Mr. VANDIVER is sick, and authorized me to say that, if present, he would vote "no" on this roll call.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the vote recapitulated.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think there may be an error in it?

Mr. BAILEY. I think it is important enough to have it recapitulated.

The vote was recapitulated.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Maine that the House resolve itself——

Mr. BAILEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER (continuing). Into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union——

Mr. BAILEY. Parliamentary inquiry!

The SPEAKER (continuing). To resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to inquire whether under the rules of the House this resolution now goes to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The gentleman can file it under the rules.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to say that in both the cases to which the Speaker referred a few moments ago—the one which I cited in support—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

This is the regular order; and gentlemen might possess their souls in patience. In both those cases, the resolutions were referred—the one which I cited, and the one which the Speaker himself cited.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman files the proposition for reference, it will take its due course.

Mr. BAILEY. But I insist that under both those decisions——

Mr. ARNOLD. I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine moves that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire now to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAILEY. When I say "now," I do not mean to concede that I have not already submitted one, because I did. But I want to know whether the Speaker holds that before this resolution can go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs it must be introduced through the box.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. From that decision I desire to appeal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DALZELL. I make the point of order that this appeal is dilatory.

Mr. PAYNE. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds that it was a parliamentary inquiry upon which the gentleman undertakes to appeal; and there is no appeal from a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. "The gentleman" does not appeal from a parliamentary inquiry, but appeals from the decision of the Chair that a resolution which has been presented to the House can not be referred to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rose and made a parliamentary inquiry, to which the Chair replied.

Mr. BAILEY. And upon the reply of the Chair I, as a matter of right, insist that the resolution shall go to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not permit an appeal from a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Chair does not correctly state the parliamentary situation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will explain the situation to the gentleman. The gentleman from Texas presented a resolution which the House has pronounced out of order. That proceeding is ended, because it has been submitted to the court of last resort, and decided. That matter is ended.

Now the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] had been recognized, pending this proposition, for a privileged motion. While the Chair was putting the question the gentleman from Texas claimed the attention of the Chair and stated that he desired to make a parliamentary inquiry, the inquiry being what had become of the resolution—whether it went to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. And the Chair stated to the gentleman that it certainly did not. Thereupon the Chair proceeded to put the question on the motion presented by the gentleman from Maine; and the gentleman from Texas then appealed. He must have appealed from the result of a parliamentary inquiry, and that can not be tolerated.

Mr. BAILEY. Not from a parliamentary inquiry——

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. But from the decision of the Chair upon a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had rendered no decision whatever.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair has decided that this resolution does not go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair answered a parliamentary inquiry, stating that it had not gone there.

Mr. BAILEY. And the Chair decides that in the face of both decisions——

Mr. HENDERSON and others. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The Chair desires to do justice to every gentleman on the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I am inclined to think the Chair is a little more anxious in that regard than the Chair's servants on the other side.

Mr. PAYNE. I object to the gentleman from Texas undertaking to lecture gentlemen on this side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Texas, on reflection, will not adhere to that statement.

Mr. BAILEY. But "the gentleman from Texas" does adhere to it.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, there were on a division (called for by Mr. BAILEY)—ayes 158, noes 100.

Mr. BAILEY (before the result of the vote was announced). I have no desire to delay the naval appropriation bill, and I will not demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very glad to see the gentleman take that course. The ayes have it; and the motion of the gentleman from Maine is agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Toward the construction of one double-sided steel floating dock of the type known as the combined floating and graving self-docking dock, $200,000, said dock to be located at the naval reservation at Algiers, La., to be capable of lifting a vessel of 15,000 tons displacement and 27 feet draft of water, to cost, including moorings and wharf, $950,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph beginning with line 20, on page 26, and ending with line 2, on page 27, including the whole of the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CANNON. My point of order is that the construction of a double-sided steel floating dock at Algiers, La., is not authorized by any existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Very briefly.

There are a number of precedents to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair, and under which similar points of order have been sustained. First, on April 10, 1890, Mr. Butterworth, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, sustained a similar point of order made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] now in charge of this bill. This point of order can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, on page 3274, which is before me.

In 1892 Mr. Shively, being then Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, sustained a similar point of order on a similar proposition for a dock at Algiers, in the Fifty-second Congress, first session.

On March 25, 1896, Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, being Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, an amendment was offered for the construction of a dry dock at League Island Navy-Yard, Pa. After full discussion on a point of order it was ruled out, although there was a navy-yard established there already, while there is none at Algiers. In point of fact, the ground has never been broken there, as I am informed, but am ready to stand corrected if this is an error.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is the gentleman's statement?

Mr. CANNON. That ground has never been broken there—at Algiers—for any such purpose.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then I will state to the gentleman, to make his information absolutely reliable, that we do not usually break ground when we are establishing a steel floating dry dock. It goes into the water. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Then no "steel floating dry dock" that goes "in the water," as the gentleman says, has ever been authorized at Algiers, La., and there is no navy-yard there, either. It is in a state of nature, so far as I am informed and so far as a navy-yard or naval station is concerned. That is, it is in the same state that it was in when the gentleman made the point of order about the dry dock at Algiers, as I have just stated.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] will undoubtedly furnish the gentleman from Illinois some further information on the same subject before he gets through.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman then made this point of order——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What was the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, here it is. I will refer it to the gentleman for his information.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I wish you would.

Mr. CANNON. I think I have it at hand in this volume.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine (continuing). For I am very glad that my friend from Illinois has found one occasion at least when he is disposed to accept my opinion upon a maritime matter. This is the first time in the history of Congress, so far as he and I have been associated here, that it has occurred. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, now, if the gentleman wants to muddy the water, if he wants to play the part of cuttlefish——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Oh, the Mississippi is muddy enough now.

Mr. CANNON. That may be, but when I get up and exercise my right on this floor, and make a point of order against a provision of the bill, and the gentleman sees proper to get personal, I ask, "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed, that he is grown so great?" [Laughter.]

In 1896 Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois sustained the point of order to an amendment for the building of a dry dock at League Island Navy-Yard, where there is a navy-yard. On February 23, 1897, the present occupant of the chair, Mr. SHERMAN of New York, then Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, sustained the point of order made by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] on an amendment then proposed to build a dry dock at Boston Navy-Yard. And that point of order was sustained by the present Chairman, who was then Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Would you give us the holding of the Chairman on that point?

Mr. CANNON. I have the ruling at hand here somewhere.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I think there was a ruling the other day.

Mr. CANNON. This, as I have stated, was on the point of order——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am referring now to the ruling made the other day. Did you not make a point of order the other day yourself, on which the Chair ruled against you?

Mr. CANNON. I think not.

Mr. PAYNE. The Chairman ruled on the other proposition a few days ago that the point of order came too late. That was the question then presented.

Mr. CANNON. That is to say, it was too late after the amendment had been offered and discussed.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Did the Chair rule on that question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the ruling was made as has been suggested by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I desire to ask him, if he believes, as it is evident he does believe, that these establishments are obnoxious to the rule and subject to the point of order, why did he not make the point of order at the proper time in these other cases?

Mr. CANNON. I will tell the gentleman very cheerfully and very fully, if the Chair will indulge me, aliunde the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I gave notice to Representatives from the Gulf States before this bill came up that I should make the point of order upon this provision, and that I would not make it upon the provision that had passed. I gave notice in the House, when last this committee sat, that I should make points of order upon this provision, and did so before the prior provision was reached, so that gentlemen might take their own course, if they desired, before the other items were read.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Does the gentleman from Illinois not know that in two separate sessions of the Fifty-second Congress this particular dock was especially mentioned, and an appropriation made therefor?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will hand me the provision, I shall be very glad to discuss it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will read the provision to the gentleman and then hand it to him. In the act making appropriations for the naval service, approved March 3, 1893, is the following:

DRY DOCK, ALGIERS, LA.

Toward the establishment of a dry dock on the Government reservation near Algiers, La., for plans and specifications and for the acquisition of such additional land as may be necessary, etc.

In the act making appropriation for the naval service, approved July 26, 1894, is the following:

DRY DOCK AT ALGIERS, LA.

For the purpose of completing the purchase of additional land necessary for the establishment of a dry dock at Algiers, La.

If that does not authorize the construction of a dry dock at Algiers, what does it authorize?

Mr. CANNON. I will answer that in a minute, if the gentleman will just give me that act.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will give you the extract from it, guaranteeing it to be correct.

Mr. CANNON. I presume it is correct. I do not know; I have not examined it. A dry dock and purchase of land for a dry dock at Algiers. Whether it has been purchased or not, I do not know. My information at the Navy Department is that there is no public work in progress, no dock in process of construction, and if the gentleman relies upon this as authorization to avoid the point of order, I will call his attention to a little reading.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman read the cross line? What does it say on the cross line? It says:

DRY DOCK, ALGIERS.

What does the cross line say for the increase of the Navy? It says:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

And on such facts decisions have heretofore always been made against such points of order as the gentleman has raised.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can not, in my judgment, produce the decisions. Now, what is this provision? I call the attention of the Chair to it.

Toward the construction of one double-sided, steel floating dock of the type known as the combined floating and graving self-docking dock, $300,000, said dock to be located at the naval reservation at Algiers, La., to be capable of lifting a vessel of 15,000 tons displacement, and 27 feet draft of water, to cost, including moorings and wharf, $350,000.

Now, if I understand what a steel floating dock is, it is one that would float out in the Mississippi River. Is there any authorization for that? It is not in the act that the gentleman has read.

Mr. CUMMINGS. But the construction of the other dry dock would have cost three times as much as this, and here you are getting a dry dock more cheaply than you would have got one if you had begun work on the other.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I am discussing the point of order.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think the rules say that a decrease in appropriation is in order.

Mr. DALZELL. No; not the present rules.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; not now.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says we own some land at Algiers. I do not know whether we do or not. I have not seen the deed. I have never known about it. If the gentleman says personally that he knows that the United States owns some land at Algiers, I will take the gentleman's word for it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And it has owned it for more than forty years.

Mr. CANNON. For forty years—since 1859. Now, twice since 1859 points of order have been sustained against an appropriation for a dry dock. The reason of the rule is this, that legislation shall not go hand and hand with an appropriation. Why, if the gentleman's statement was true that any provision to build a dry dock or a floating steel dock to float in the river was in order, where the United States owned water or land, one or both, then it would be in order to move for the construction of a floating steel dock at any point on our 10,000 miles of coast, because the United States absolutely owns for a marine league from the shore, if I recollect aright, the water and the land covered by the water.

Now, my point is simply this: This floating steel dry dock is not authorized by any law. It takes legislation as well as appropriation, without this provision, that this money should be used for a floating steel dry dock. Even if you appropriated it, it could not be used, and in the absence of any public improvement actually proceeding, it is subject to the point of order, in my judgment. Aye, more; the decisions have gone invariably to the point that at League Island and Boston, where there are navy-yards and have been for half a century, an amendment to construct a dry dock even at those navy-yards was not in order until authorized by legislation.

Why? Because the experience of this House prompted it to make this rule. It is dangerous to have legislation upon a general appropriation bill because the general appropriation bill must pass, and the necessity of its passing drags legislation along with it, and the experience of Congress shows that such legislation is generally not wise. Therefore the rules of the House cut that legislation up by the root when the point of order is made.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, this legislation in regard to a dry dock at Algiers was begun after four different boards, appointed by the Navy Department under both Republican and Democratic Administrations, had sought a place upon which a dock could be built upon the Gulf, or near the Gulf, where it would not be subject to bombardment or destruction by the guns of a hostile fleet in case of war. After these four different boards had reported in favor of this dock this appropriation was put in the naval bill for a dock. Words, I take it, mean what they say in legislation, or at least they ought to mean what they say. The provision is explicit. You can not make it more so.

DRY DOCK, ALGIERS, LA.

That is the cross line.

Toward the establishment of a dry dock on the Government reservation near Algiers, La.

Why did you not make your point of order at that time, in that Congress? No; you failed to do so, or, if you did do so, it was overruled and the House took the provision as it read. More than this, in the next session, I read again, a cross line in the naval appropriation bill, part of the legislation of the bill:

DRY DOCK AT ALGIERS, LA.

For the purpose of completing the purchase of additional lands necessary for the establishment of a dry dock at Algiers, La.

So that in two sessions of Congress this work has been authorized.

Now, I say that a floating steel dock is a dry dock, and it carries out in letter and spirit the words of the laws of 1892 and 1893.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that my distinguished friend from Illinois, the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has not emulated the spirit of the gentleman from Texas, but is manifesting a disposition to incite unnecessary obstructions to the great appropriation bill which has now been before the House much longer than it ought to have been. It seemed to me that the gentleman from Illinois had exhausted the contest on this subject on Saturday. If I ever in my legislative experience became thoroughly convinced as to the attitude of this House upon any subject, I was convinced on Saturday that this House of Representatives, in the Committee of the Whole, were overwhelmingly in favor of providing the dry docks authorized in this bill and authorizing the battle ships provided in this bill.

I thought we fought it out fairly and squarely. Now here, when we get to the bill to-day, after one or two hours of other business, my friend, to whom I feel I ought to be able to look for assistance in promoting the passage of a great money bill of this House, a brother chairman, to whom I have always given the most earnest and hearty support in his endeavor to transact public business, insists on raising these old questions of order upon the construction of a dry dock, a floating dry dock, at Algiers, and he goes back and cites irrelevant and not very important points of order I may have made in times past.

Now, I hope I learn something from time to time, and while I made a point of order in the Forty-ninth Congress, the second Congress that I served in, I suppose I was perhaps almost as fresh as other gentlemen I have seen coming in with a little red book, and taking that book and going down to the front and making points of order, and it may be that my conduct met with the same discomfiture as theirs. I do not think or expect that my experience is important, but what is most important to me is, after some experience of legislation, and a great deal of experience in naval legislation, and considerable experience in making points of order, I am absolutely satisfied that the point of order can not properly lie under the rules of this House against the provision for a dry dock in a naval appropriation bill at a naval station or navy-yard of the United States. A navy-yard is not a complete institution without a dry dock.

There is no component part of a navy-yard which is more primarily an essential of the navy-yard than a dry dock. You have to dock ships to repair them, and you have to build a dry dock at a navy-yard in order to utilize any of the facilities of which it is possessed. Now, in regard to the dry dock at Louisiana, I only want to say this, that the point of order against that——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. You put it on the ground that it is a mere incident, and not new legislation.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. You look on it as repairs.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I just look on it like all other things for which provision is made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Like repair of an existing institution.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Like repair of existing institution—like putting up a machine shop, or putting in additional machines—just carrying on existing and long since authorized institutions of the naval establishment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to say to the gentleman from what I know of the temper of the committee it is with him, and I hope it will be possible to have a vote at once.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I think so myself; and on the point of order, which I think is——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not criticise the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I only want to say this in regard to the original point of order. I was opposed to the building of the graving dock at Algiers, cutting through the levee of the Mississippi, because from my knowledge of that locality—for I sailed in and out of that port years ago—I was doubtful, somewhat more than doubtful, in my mind whether it would be safe to cut through the levee; and again, if we cut through, whether it would be safe to swing great ships across the current and put them in that dock.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I would rather not until I get through.

Mr. RIDGELY. I want to know if we have a navy-yard at Algiers?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] read a statement that we have had a reservation there since 1849, and the Fifty-second Congress appropriated money to buy additional land there for the express purpose of building a dry dock.

Mr. RIDGELY. Have we any machinery or shops there?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Upon that——

Mr. CANNON. My information from the Navy Department is that we have not; that ground has not been broken there.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This brings up another phase of the matter which I was going to leave to my friend from Louisiana. I was opposed, as I said, to constructing a dock there and cutting through the levee; but I am bound to say in justice that gentlemen more familiar with the Mississippi River than I argued that it could be done. But that is not the proposition here to-day. The provision of this bill is that a steel floating dry dock shall be built at Algiers. That is recommended by the Bunce board of naval officers appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to consider this whole question, and the report and recommendation of that board is reenforced in the strongest manner by the Navy Department itself.

Now, I have no question about the practicability of the floating dry dock in Algiers. I could not have, because I have docked ships there myself in a floating dock many years ago. So this proposition stands entirely different before the House on its merits from that which came up years ago. Another thing that makes me regret my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has made a point of order on this proposition after the House has adopted the provision providing for other dry docks is that this dock is the only one on this bill that is located in the Southern States anywhere near the Gulf of Mexico. I know that I was actuated, and my committee was actuated, and I believe this House will be actuated in voting upon this measure, very strongly by the fact that everybody must recognize that we need some docking facilities in that region of the country.

There has been a dispute as to the location. Several States and localities have competed for the location of these docks, and to-day the steel floating dock located at Algiers is before Congress as the one practical recommendation of the Bunce dock board and of the Secretary of the Navy, to whom my friend, by his motion of Saturday, was desirous of referring the question of locating these docks. That this is subject to a point of order I do not for one moment believe. If this naval bill is authorized to carry a provision for anything, it is authorized to carry a provision for a dry dock. If you want to establish and appropriate the location under the legislation of this bill, it seems to me it has been supplied by the fact that Congress itself has provided for the establishment and has voted money to purchase land at these stations for the very purpose of affording facilities necessary in connection with the construction of a dry dock.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, there is one point to which I wish to call attention, lest it may be thought that a floating dry dock stands upon a different footing from an ordinary dry dock. The floating dry dock is not a new kind of structure; floating dry docks have been in use for a great many years. It is as necessary to have land for a floating dry dock as it is for any other kind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me a question?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Has this species of dock been tried by other nations and found to be useful?

Mr. SOUTHARD. The report of the board shows that a great many of them are in use.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. In satisfactory use?

Mr. SOUTHARD. In satisfactory use. They have not been employed to the same extent that other dry docks have, but they have been usually employed in lifting vessels.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will they dock a vessel as heavy as a battle ship?

Mr. SOUTHARD. They have been constructed to lift vessels heavier than battle ships. This provides for a dry dock that will lift 15,000 tons, and that is heavier than any battle ship we have.

Mr. CUMMINGS. They are docking the Spanish war ships in Havana Harbor to-day in a steel floating dry dock.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I want to state this, that the appropriation was first made for the establishment of this dry dock. It was found that they had not sufficient land, and a further appropriation was made to pay for land taken by condemnation proceedings. In order to acquire possession of that land it was necessary to allege that the land was wanted for public use, for a public object, and that public object was stated to be the location of a dry dock. We submit that the point of order comes too late, because this is clearly within the rule providing that appropriations must be for a public work, works already in progress.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, only a word in conclusion. I intended to confine myself, and I thought I did confine myself, to a discussion of the point of order. I do not desire to go over that again; and I do not know that it is in good taste to reply to the argument that has been made by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Maine. They say that there is no dry dock on the Gulf. There is a navy-yard at Pensacola; that is on the Gulf.

Now, the question is whether you have water enough. You have got as much water at Pensacola as you have over the bar.

Mr. OGDEN. The Mississippi has a depth of 90 feet at New Orleans. This is not located on the bar; it is located in the river at New Orleans, where there is a depth of 90 feet at low water.

Mr. CANNON. Can you get a ship with a draft of 90 feet (if there were such a ship) up the Mississippi?

Mr. OGDEN. Do they build dry docks 90 feet deep to dock a ship?

Mr. CANNON. No; but I state again that you have less than 26 feet of water over the bar which you must pass to get up to Algiers.

Mr. OGDEN. Who denies that?

Mr. CANNON. What, then, has your 90 feet of water to do with the question?

Mr. OGDEN. We are not proposing to build this at the bar,

100 miles below New Orleans, but in deep water, in the harbor of New Orleans.

Mr. CANNON. But how are you going to get a ship up to it?

Mr. OGDEN. Over the bar.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; over the bar, where there is only 26 feet of water.

Now, in reply to the gentleman from Maine, so far as he discussed this question, I wish to say that I have made a point of order on this paragraph and shall do so on the succeeding paragraph from a sense of duty. Why? Because I do not want a permanent combination to be made amongst different dry docks—a combination that will take in Portsmouth and Boston and League Island and will have hitched onto it Mare Island and Algiers and Galveston. To that kind of a combination I feel it my duty, in the interest of good legislation, to interpose my objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Only a word. The Committee on Naval Affairs, I am sure, would be perfectly willing for me to state frankly to the House that, while this matter is not, in our judgment, subject to a point of order, yet if gentlemen desire to obstruct legislation of an emergency character they can find in this bill a number of items that are technically subject to a point of order. We put in the bill some items which we knew to be subject to a point of order, because we believed it was necessary to get this legislation through Congress as rapidly as possible without being subjected to the delays of going on the Calendar.

If there is any gentleman in this House who desires to put himself on record as undertaking to impede and obstruct the effort of the Committee on Naval Affairs to put into this bill as a speedy mode of reaching a result legislation not simply that we approved, but legislation which we believed the House and the country desire and demand shall be disposed of as rapidly as possible, of course he can do it. But I hope my friend from Illinois and others will not undertake by the introduction of any technicalities here to defeat the carrying out of the good purpose we had in view in bringing before this House for action as speedily as possible measures which we regard as important to-day for the welfare and safety of our country.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in simple justice to myself, one word. I have not been, and am not, obstructing the passage of this bill. I said the other day that I was substantially in sympathy with it. I do not take kindly the lecture that the gentleman from Maine gives me. I criticise this bill where, in the name of "emergency," it proposes to authorize expenditures to the extent of $20,000,000 upon work that can not be completed inside of three years.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Very good. If this House approves the gentleman's criticism, it will strike out some of those appropriations.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has seen fit to make a point of order on any of the provisions of this bill, and still more that he confines his point to a construction, and the only one, proposed for the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, the Southern confines of our country.

I had thought, and still think, that the country's new Navy, which typifies the might and majesty of the Union of the States, was built up and is being increased by the joint efforts of the people of every section of this broad land—by those of the South as well as those of the North and the East and the West.

The Navy is something to kindle pride and patriotism in the hearts of every American citizen. Its ships, its guns and torpedoes are equal to any in the world, and I trust that ere many years we may be able to state likewise regarding its docks and navy-yards. Its officers represent every Congressional district in the land. They represent the bravery and devotion that made such resplendent records for the armies and navies of the Union in all of our history, and yet, in the face of this fact, the gentleman from Illinois, who made an ineffectual attack on some of the other docks embodied in this bill, raises his point of order exclusively against the clauses relating to the Gulf coast, when he must know, if he has given any investigation to the subject, that if any of the appropriations in this clause are obnoxious to the rule he invokes, the dry dock at Algiers can not be so considered. The gentleman, in his speech on Saturday last, asserts that he loves his country, and that his patriotism is equal to that of anyone who has spoken in advocacy of the common defense; that he has as much pride in the naval service of his country and all its navy-yards and harbors as anyone. His evident want of consideration for the Southern portion of our land therefore strikes me as most remarkable.

Mr. Chairman, Algiers, a part of New Orleans, as shown by the reports of three separate and successive commissions and naval boards, is indicated as the proper site on the Gulf coast for a dry dock.

It can not be pretended that places directly on the Gulf coast are exempt or safe from hostile attack.

The most formidable expedition, composed of land and naval forces, ever set on foot against this country was directed in 1814–15 against the Territory of Louisiana at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

It was repelled only by the almost superhuman valor of the troops of the South and West and by the matchless generalship and courage of Andrew Jackson.

Is it necessary to remind gentlemen whose States border on our mighty river of the patriotic words of Henry Clay?—

While the Mississippi River continues to bear the tributes of the Iron Mountains and the Alleghenies to her delta and to the Gulf of Mexico the 8th of January shall be remembered; and the glory of that day shall stimulate future patriots and nerve the arms of unborn freemen in driving the presumptuous invader from our country's soil.

Sir, the interests which would now be imperiled by an invasion are larger than they were then. A successful blow at Louisiana would be felt throughout the entire Mississippi Valley.

Great naval operations and combats on the Gulf in case of war are not only possible, but extremely probable.

For nearly a century the strategy of our naval officers has been directed to the problem of successful defense. Even now you have an object lesson in the presence of a large fleet in the Gulf. Suppose that by the violence of storms or of battle or by other accidents one or more of our war vessels should need docking and repairs, would it not be a matter of the highest necessity to have your ships promptly docked, repaired, and refitted in the waters of the Mississippi River? You have fresh water, numberless skilled mechanics, ample coal and timber supplies, and an inland point free from bombardment by vessels standing out at sea.

Suppose this wise step were to be rejected; what is the alternative? You will have to send your vessel, needing repairs after a naval engagement or a storm, all around the tortuous and hazardous channel of the Florida coast, a distance of some 1,200 or more miles, exposed in a semihelpless condition to the dangers of the tempest and of hostile attacks. Why, the mere time which would be lost in this operation might of itself be sufficient to determine the question of naval superiority.

IMPORTANCE OF REPAIR FACILITIES.

I suppose that every member who gives any thought to the question of the Navy must be aware that it is not more important to build and maintain ships of war than it is to provide adequate facilities for their repair. The cleaning of the bottoms of ships fouled after long exposure to the sea, and the repair of ships after injury done in battle, tempest, or by other casualty, can only be promptly and efficiently performed by means of dry docks. The number and location of these docks must be proportioned to the number of our war vessels and to the needs of this or that portion of our long coast line.

DOCKS ON NEW ENGLAND COAST.

I do not agree with the gentlemen who have attacked the provision for two docks on the New England coast. That coast, in case of war with England or any foreign power, would be much exposed. I do not believe that the great fortifications, the great military and naval equipment at Halifax, was for the empty purpose of show or merely to spend money. It is a weapon pointed at our breasts. New England is the first in the line of attack in case of trouble with England or France.

A DOCK NEEDED ON THE GULF COAST.

On the Gulf coast we are so far absolutely without any means of docking and repairing a ship of war. True, we have taken some steps in this direction, but there we have halted, and I insist that it is now the duty of the Government to go forward and complete its work. I wish briefly to review what has been done in the premises. Enough, I admit, has been done to define clearly the policy of the Government, not only for a dry dock on the Gulf coast, but a selection of the proper location has been made and a purchase made of the land needed for the site, in addition to the land we had already available for this purpose and other provisions.

IMPORTANCE OF DEFENDING GULF COAST.

The importance of defending our Gulf coast was most strongly suggested by the great naval and military expedition directed against Louisiana at the mouth of the Mississippi River by Great Britain in the war of 1812–1815. That invasion was foiled by the valor of our troops from the South and West, and the British were finally driven, as Jackson predicted they would be, from the soil of Louisiana. The British fleet, however, lay off our shores and were far too strong to be assailed. It was a lucky escape for us. It was the most formidable expedition, composed of land and sea forces, ever set on foot against the country. Although a treaty of peace had previously been signed at Ghent, it may be doubted whether Great Britain would willingly have surrendered the mouth of the Mississippi if she had once obtained possession of southern Louisiana, with her ample fleet and means of reenforcement.

The world's history shows how strong powers are apt to act in such situations. This struggle, to say nothing of other considerations, has made the defense of the Gulf Coast a favorite subject for study by our most eminent naval officers. I doubt if it has ever been lost sight of by the best naval men from the time when it was discussed by that great man, Lieut. M. F. Maury, down to the present time. For many years the subject of a Government dry dock somewhere on the Gulf Coast has engaged public attention. Very naturally there were several competing points, and the claims of each one have been well presented and duly weighed by our naval authorities.

A COMMISSION APPOINTED.

Under these circumstances, with all our naval authorities and experts backed by a strong public opinion in favor of a Government dry dock somewhere on the Gulf coast, it was wisely determined by Congress to enter upon this policy. In the naval appropriation bill approved September 7, 1888, the sum of $15,000 was appropriated—

For the expenses of a commission of three officers, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, to report as to the most desirable location on or near the coast of the Gulf of Mexico and the South Atlantic coast for navy-yards and dry docks, and for the expenses of sounding and surveying and estimating expenses.

This commission was appointed by Secretary Whitney on January 21, 1889, and after organizing received their instructions, bearing date January 28, 1889. These instructions for their information and guidance are of the most comprehensive character and evince a profound study of the considerations which ought to enter into a selection of a site for this navy-yard and dry dock. The object stated was to be—

An establishment for the repair and construction of naval vessels, to be duly provided with adequate docking resources, and to be the important naval arsenal and depot of our naval forces cruising and operating in or near the Gulf of Mexico, the West Indies, and the Caribbean Sea.

The Department further remarks:

The Department wishes you to consider the general and strategical requirements of such a naval station in this part of the United States, especially its bearing as a naval base for operations for guarding the mouths of the Mississippi and its water-borne trade, for the defense of the ports, coasts, and waters of the Gulf of Mexico, and for the protection of our trade and interests in the Caribbean Sea. The direct routes to the Central American Isthmus, and its probable ship canal from the eastern coasts of the United States, it must be borne in mind, pass through the channels that lead out of or near by the Gulf of Mexico.

The consideration of this phase of the question should also include the relative positions of the various fortified naval ports of strong European powers now existing or to be established in the West Indies, toward the location to be selected, these ports being points from which hostile operations can be based against our trade and coasts.

THE SPECIAL REQUIREMENTS FOR A NAVY-YARD.

The special requirements for a navy-yard were also set forth. Among these were—

A situation upon a good harbor, of sufficient size, depth, and accessibility for vessels of the largest size and heaviest draft;

A favorable position with respect to the principal lines of defense;

A local security from water attack, due to position and natural surroundings;

Ample water frontage of sufficient depth;

A favorable position with reference to the lines of interior communication by rail and otherwise with the principal sources of supplies; and

Proximity to centers of labor and supplies of material, healthfulness of climate, and an ample supply of good potable water.

The commission as finally constituted consisted of Commodore W. P. McCann, Capt. Robert Boyd, and Lieut. Willard H. Brownson.

On the Gulf coast this commission carefully examined Key West, Fla.; Tampa Bay, Florida; Pensacola Bay, Florida; Mobile Bay, Alabama; Mount Vernon, Ala.; Biloxi, Miss., and Algiers, a point in Louisiana, on the Mississippi, directly opposite the city of New Orleans, where the Government, as at other points, had already acquired a body of land for naval purposes.

The report of the commission to the Department, dated November 19, 1889, is elaborate and exhaustive. The relative advantages and disadvantages of each point suggested for a navy and dock yard are set forth in detail with great care, and with an entire freedom from bias and an ability which render it impossible to resist their conclusions.

ALGIERS, LA. (NEW ORLEANS), THE MOST SUITABLE SITE.

The commission report in favor of New Orleans, or rather Algiers, on the other side of the river, as the best location. They say:

New Orleans is the terminus of six trunk lines of railroads. The communications by water with the vast extent of territory embraced in the valley of the Mississippi is unsurpassed. It is the principal commercial port of the Gulf States, and possesses great facilities for obtaining every class of building material, skilled and unskilled labor, and supplies; coal is abundant and cheap. The amount of commerce that passes in and out of the Gulf of Mexico is a very large portion of the total commerce of the United States. The amount of export from New Orleans coming from the whole Mississippi basin and much of the great West will demand protection at any cost, and consequently, whether the navy-yard be located at New Orleans or elsewhere, the Passes and all the approaches to the city will have to be defended as thoroughly as military and naval skill can effect it. Such being the case, and since there is no other point in the Gulf of equal importance, or the closing of which would do as much injury to so large a district or to so many people, no other place will have or begin to have the same protection and care, unless the Government establishes elsewhere a navy-yard, and it is absolutely necessary to protect it in order to retain the command of the Gulf.

Upon the vital question of an adequate depth of water this board reports, in 1889, a channel of 26 feet, a central depth of over 30 feet, and they quote the Mississippi River Commission for the opinion that—

The channel at the South Pass jetties is permanent in the sense that it will be possible to maintain a channel there of at least 26 feet at low water in the river so long as the jetties are maintained to deep water and the damages from storms are repaired.

In conclusion, the board says:

After carefully weighing all the advantages and disadvantages of Algiers as a site for a naval station, the commission is of the opinion that, while the spot is not an ideal one, no other place on the Gulf compares with it in the advantages offered, and that the advantages are so many and so great, and outweigh the disadvantages to such an extent, that the commission has no hesitation in recommending the location of a navy-yard and dry docks at the present Government reservation at Algiers, La.

The report of this commission, which did its work so thoroughly, would be sufficient to convince any reasonable man of the propriety of locating a naval establishment at this point as a part of our system of defense of the Gulf coast and of the outlet provided by nature for the great Mississippi Valley. But it does not stand alone and unsupported. We have the report of another scientific commission on the same subject, which substantially adopts the same conclusion as the commission already cited. In the act making appropriations for the naval service approved June 30, 1890, it was enacted as follows:

And the President be, and he is hereby, required to appoint a commission composed of two competent naval officers, one competent Army officer, and two competent persons from civil life, whose duty it shall be to select a suitable site, having due regard to commercial and naval interests, for a dry dock at some point on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico or the waters connected therewith; and having settled such site, shall, if upon private lands, estimate its value and ascertain as nearly as practicable the cost for which it can be purchased or acquired, and of their proceedings and action make full and detailed report to the President, and the President shall transmit such report with his recommendations to Congress.

The President performed his duty under this law by appointing on November 22, 1890, a commission composed as follows: Capt. F. M. Bunce, United States Navy, president; Col. C. B. Comstock, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Sidney Perham, of Maine; David T. Littler, of Illinois; Lieut. R. M. G. Brown, United States Navy.

The commission met at the Navy Department December 5, 1890, and organized. Shortly afterwards, by the direction of the President, Colonel Comstock was relieved of this duty and Maj. H. C. Hasbrouck, United States Army, substituted in his stead.

This commission made a careful study of the question, and its report (Ex. Doc. H. R., Fifty-secon dCongress, first session) is of great value not only for the mass of facts and suggestions which it contains, but for its interesting references to the studies and reports of eminent Army and Navy officers who, through a series of years, have discussed the matter of a naval defense of our commercial interests in the Gulf of Mexico. The commission report that—

The requisites for the proposed dry dock are a clear channel to the sea of a depth of at least 26 feet, stability of foundation to support a load of 15,000 tons, and protection by a distance of 12 miles or by an intervening elevation of the ground from gun fire from the sea.

The commission proceeded to make a personal inspection of all the places on the Gulf suggested as a site. They thus visited Key West, Tampa, Pensacola, Mobile, Port Eads, New Orleans, Galveston, and Aransas Pass. The merits and demerits of each point are given in the report. Their conclusion is that—

The South Pass of the Mississippi affords the only entrance 26 feet deep to a port or harbor on the Gulf of Mexico, or the waters connected therewith, far enough from the sea to be safe from gun fire.

They further report as follows:

The Mississippi River Commission, through its president, Gen. C. B. Comstock, colonel of engineers, United States Army, states that—

"The channel at the South Pass Jetties is permanent in the sense that it will be possible to maintain a channel there of at least 26 feet depth at low water in the river as long as the jetties are maintained to deep water and the damages from storms repaired."

An opinion in which this commission, after a careful examination, concurs.

New Orleans, about 100 miles up the river, is the largest city of the Gulf States. From the entrance of the South Pass to this city a depth of more than 26 feet can be carried at all times. The soil of the river banks in its vicinity, at the surface light, is from 2 to 4 feet below the surface of clay, or clay and sand, increasing in density and solidity with the depth of the boring or excavation made, insuring a foundation amply sufficient to support a load of 15,000 tons in the dock by the employment of the usual methods in its construction.

The three primary requisites of a site for a dry dock are here found, and New Orleans is the only port on the Gulf of Mexico or the waters connected therewith where this is the case.

This port has other and great advantages as the site. The greatest center of population of the Gulf States, labor, skilled or otherwise, can be obtained at short notice. Its foreign commerce is greater than that of all the other Gulf ports together, last year reaching 2,004,072 tons; all others, 1,997,892 tons. A fresh-water harbor, its water communication with the interior by the Mississippi and its tributaries is nowhere in the world equaled, and this is supplemented by six great railroad lines, which, with their connections, reach every part of the country. Defense of these by the whole power of the nation is assured; it is a military necessity. Fresh water for all uses is supplied by filtering the river water, the rainfall, and by artesian wells. Epidemic diseases of foreign origin are prevented by a strict system of quarantine regulations, and the general health of the city is as good as that of any Gulf port. A supply of iron, coal, or other material required can always be head at short notice and at cheap rates.

I need not quote further from this cogent and unanswerable report in favor of New Orleans as the true site for a dry dock on the Gulf coast. The board was unanimous in its finding and conclusion.

This conclusion in favor of New Orleans was emphatically approved by the then Secretary of the Navy, the Hon. B. F. Tracy, and on the 19th of January, 1892, the report was transmitted to Congress by President Harrison.

In the annual report of Secretary Tracy, dated November 26, 1890, he says, referring to this commission:

In the annual report of last year the Department dwelt upon the extreme necessity of a navy-yard or dry dock on the Northwest coast and also upon the Gulf. This necessity remains as great as ever.

ADVOCACY OF SECRETARIES OF THE NAVY TRACY AND HERBERT.

Shortly after the report of the first commission I have referred to, Secretary Tracy appeared before the Committee on Naval Affairs and recommended that a dry dock be established at Algiers. The opinion of this eminent Secretary of the Navy, as well as Secretary Herbert and all the experts of the Navy Department, has been in favor of selecting New Orleans as the site for a Government dry dock.

The report of the Hon. Mr. Herbert from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, dated March 10, 1892 (Report No. 621, House of Representatives, Fifty-second Congress, first session), says:

A navy-yard upon the Gulf of Mexico or waters connected therewith has always been deemed a necessity.

The repairs of government ships in all countries able to build and maintain navies are done in government shops. It is impracticable, if not impossible, to have such work done by contract, first, because of the difficulty of finding shops having the necessary plant; and secondly, and indeed principally, because of the impossibility of estimating beforehand the value of and contracting for such work at fair prices.

It is expensive and tedious to bring ships belonging to the Gulf Squadron to the navy-yards on the Atlantic coast for repairs. The navy-yard at Pensacola is not in condition to do such work, and the question has been for a long time open as to the point upon or contiguous to the Gulf of Mexico at which a yard should be fitted up for doing such work. Naval authorities have for many years past opposed the refitting of the Pensacola yard, for the reason that it was so much exposed to the fire of a modern fleet.

Two commissions have been appointed, one after another, to visit points upon the Gulf and report the most advantageous site for a dock and ship yard. Both these commissions, one after another, recommended the Government reservation at Algiers, opposite the city of New Orleans.

Since the beginning of our new Navy the Government has fitted up the navy-yards at Norfolk and Brooklyn with extensive plants, not only for repairs but for the building of ships of war. A similar plant has been established on the Pacific coast at Mare Island, and if at any time it is contemplated to fit out a yard upon the Gulf of Mexico, it has seemed to your committee that the work ought to be begun now. They have therefore reported a provision authorizing the erection of a dock at Algiers, and have recommended an appropriation of $250,000 toward the construction of such dock and the purchase of additional land contiguous to this reservation.

CONGRESS ADOPTS REPORT AND ESTABLISHES THE SITE.

The general and emphatic approval of this scheme by the naval authorities and the committees of the two Houses have exercised a natural influence upon Congress, Secretary Tracy having indicated in his communication, forwarding to Congress the report of the second commission to Congress, that the existing naval reservation at Algiers, La., was too limited in extent for the proper location and use of the dry dock, and that it would be "necessary to purchase additional lands adjoining." Congress responded to this recommendation by inserting the following appropriation in the act making appropriations for the naval service approved March 3, 1893:

DRY DOCK, ALGIERS, LA.

Toward the establishment of a dry dock on the Government reservation near Algiers, La.: For plans and specifications and for the acquisition of such additional land as may be necessary, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, in accordance with the recommendations of two commissions appointed by the President under the provisions of an act approved September 7, 1888, and the act approved June 30, 1890, respectively, $25,000.

Here you have in clear and unmistakable language an adoption by the lawmaking power of the recommendations of those two commissions and of all the naval experts, both as to the policy of construction upon the Gulf coast of a dry dock upon a scale commensurate with the size of our largest war vessels and of the site specifically named and recommended. Nothing is left to inference. The investigation was complete. The findings were unanimous and positive in favor of New Orleans, and Congress proceeded to take the initial step by an appropriation to buy the additional land needed.

In the act making appropriations for the naval service approved July 26, 1894, Congress proceeded to make an additional appropriation for this object, in the following words:

DRY DOCK AT ALGIERS, LA.

For the purpose of completing the purchase of additional lands necessary for the establishment of a dry dock at Algiers, La., cost of advertising, plans and specifications for said dry dock, and expenses of judicial proceedings instituted for the condemnation of such additional lands, $23,025.03.

All that now remains is for Congress to make an adequate appropriation to commence the construction of this dry dock. All the initial or preparatory steps have been taken wisely and considerately. This House made an appropriation of $100,000 for this purpose of construction in the naval appropriation bill for the service of the year ending June 30, 1896, but it was disagreed to by the Senate, mainly upon the plea of economy and the condition of our revenues.

It was, however, expressly stated by the Senator in charge of the measure that this action was taken by the Naval Committee without prejudice to the merits of the measure. The opinion of the Senate upon it was clearly indicated at a prior session, namely, the 15th of February, 1892, when a bill providing for this construction passed that body unanimously. Thus it will be seen that each body, though not acting concurrently, has declared itself for commencing the construction of this dock at Algiers, opposite the city of New Orleans.

Secretary Long says in his annual report (1897) that—

At Algiers, New Orleans, a steel floating dock, with necessary wharf and moorings, should be constructed. In the report of the board appointed to consider the subject of dry docks, made in September last, of which Admiral Bunce was president, it was stated:

THE GULF OF MEXICO.

There are no dry docks or adequate docking facilities on the whole coast of this Gulf nor upon its tributary waters. The commission appointed November 22, 1890, to select a suitable site, having due regard to the commercial and naval interests, for a dry dock at some point on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico or the waters connected therewith, selected as the place New Orleans, La., and as the site of the dock the naval reservation at Algiers, a part of that city.

After a careful review of the present conditions, which relatively have not changed, although the channels to the harbors of Galveston and Pensacola have been deepened, respectively, to 25 and 23 feet, the board adopts the conclusions of that commission for the reasons stated in its report (EX. Doc. No. 79, House of Representatives, Fifty-second Congress, first session).

Mr. Chairman, it will not do to say that a nation with more than 70,000,000 people and such great wealth and resources can not undertake this work, and that some two or three dry docks upon the Atlantic coast are to limit our naval preparation for war and for peace. The officers of our Navy tell you that they are wholly insufficient. If war should come, and war almost always comes unexpectedly, it would find us imperfectly prepared to meet its exigencies even on the Atlantic coast, and wholly unprepared on the Gulf coast to repair our ships.

Is this not criminal negligence? Would not the disasters that would follow as a natural consequence of such neglect be a shame and a reproach to the Congress that had turned a deaf ear to the appeals of your highest naval authorities? They have given you the actual situation and pointed out the danger time and time again. Can you afford to neglect their warning?

I can not believe, sir, that any man will be so blind as to imagine that, in case of war, naval operations and conflicts would not occur in the Gulf of Mexico. If you invite attack, then, by your neglect it will surely come. Surely there is no man so ill informed as to dream that vessels crippled in action or which from any cause in war or peace are needing repairs can be safely and economically dispatched on a long and hazardous voyage by way of the Florida coast to some dock upon the Atlantic coast for the needed docking and repairs. The mere delay incident to such a voyage and in making repairs might determine a naval engagement upon the Gulf of Mexico and determine it in favor of the foreign flag against our own.

ENTIRE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY AFFECTED.

Mr. Chairman, this question covers the entire Mississippi Valley. It may be thought by some inconsiderate persons that in case of a war the upper part of this great valley would not be exposed to invasion, and therefore would regard the protection of the mouth of the Mississippi and the Gulf coast as of secondary consequence. But the people of the upper portion of the valley entertain no such narrow, shallow, and unpatriotic views. With them the security of the mouth of the Mississippi and the freedom of its commerce has been a darling object for over a century. It has engaged the attention of their ablest statesmen. The occupation of Louisiana by a foreign nation in 1815 would have been as odious to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri as it was to Louisiana and Mississippi. In the recent civil war one of the strongest considerations that impelled the States of the Northwest to put forth their energies to maintain the Union was the fear of seeing the southern outlet of the Mississippi Valley pass out of their hands and fall under the control of a different political power. They held that the control of this outlet was important for their security and essential to their trade and maritime interests.

THE GULF COAST AND MISSISSIPPI VALLEY ALL INVOLVED.

In pleading for the proper treatment of the Mississippi River and its military needs and defenses, I speak for the whole valley and not for New Orleans alone. Geography may make us keener to observe the opportunity of the hour, but the dwellers on the prairies, the toiling farmers all through the Northwest, have an interest in the matter hardly second to our own. It is their interest and their right to demand the protection of this outlet that nature has given them and us. And in speaking for the proposed naval dock at New Orleans for repair of our ships, I wish to suggest the obvious thought that this step is not merely the defense of New Orleans and the Lower Mississippi, but also of Galveston, Mobile, and the whole Gulf coast.

The fleet which can be assembled, refitted, and armed at New Orleans is a security against the rapine and violence of a foreign foe, no matter at what point on the Gulf coast he may strike at our commerce, property, and soil, and just in proportion as this station and dock is made fit to serve the purposes of war and peace will its benefits be felt throughout the Gulf Coast and in every city of its borders. There is a unity of interest for the whole Gulf Coast and every part of the Mississippi Valley.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have shown that by two distinct and separate acts Congress has clearly expressed its will in favor of this establishment and an appropriation for it. Upon these acts alone I am willing to rest this case. To argue further would be like unto the endeavor—

> To gild refined gold, to paint the lily,
> To throw a perfume on the violet—

which the great bard tells us—

> Is wasteful and ridiculous excess.

Mr. Chairman, I now submit to your decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on this question.

Clause 2 of Rule XXI provides, among other things, that no appropriation shall be in order upon any appropriation bill, whether original or as an amendment thereto, that has not been previously authorized by law,

Surely any appropriation, under the language of the rule, that has been authorized by previous law is in order; and it seems perfectly clear to the Chair that it was the intention of Congress, by the act of March, 1893, and of July, 1894, to provide for a dry dock at Algiers, La. That seems to be perfectly clear, and the Chair, therefore, is constrained to overrule the point of order.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a board of naval officers to determine the desirability of locating and constructing a dry dock in the harbor of Galveston, Tex., and to report such finding to the next session of the present Congress, and the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of said board.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph commencing with line 7, on page 27, down to and including line 13, on the same page.

The CHAIRMAN. What point does the gentleman make?

Mr. CANNON. I make the point of order that there is no law authorizing this appropriation anywhere to be found, and there is no provision of law which contemplates any such legislation.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Pending the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer the following amendment, that may be subject to the same point of order. I would like to have it read for the information of the committee and have the matter all disposed of at the same time.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not see how the gentleman can do that. After the point of order has been decided, of course an amendment may be offered. But if the point of order is pending, that must be first disposed of. If this paragraph should go out, there would be no amendment to be offered, for there would be nothing to amend.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I can not see what objections the chairman has.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I have no objection. I leave the matter to the Chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order on this paragraph. Does the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs desire to be heard?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. He does.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman from Texas, as I understand it, desires the amendment to be read which attempts to add authorization to examine another site. I want to say that I have no objection to it, but it only occurred to me that it could not come in under our procedure here at this point.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY] desires to discuss the point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, believing in the disposition of the Chair to apply the principle as well as the precedents on this point of order, and relying on its entire fairness, I shall not attempt to persuade him with respect to his conclusions, except so far as he may be influenced by reason of the great purpose underlying the authorization and direction to the Secretary of the Navy to determine the desirability of locating and constructing a dry dock in the harbor of Galveston, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Texas that the gentleman from Illinois did not reserve the point of order. He made it absolutely. So, unless the gentleman desires to discuss the point of order, the Chair prefers to rule upon it now.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman proceeding. I would be glad if the committee would give unanimous consent that he might have five minutes.

I will reserve, if necessary, the point of order. But I want to be particularly understood that I will insist upon it hereafter. I ask that he have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Texas will be heard for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the principle is as old as war—older than civilization—for a people to know every source of strength and weakness, at every point, subject to assault or serviceable as a haven.

The harbor of Galveston and its approaches, the depth and width of its channel, the area of deep water for the anchorage of our largest ships, its unusual accessibility and ease of entrance—the protection offered shipping by the 12 miles of jetty walls, projecting into the sea, which walls were planned and constructed by the United States Engineer Corps, have resulted in creating the deepest channel and the finest harbor on the shore of the Mexican Gulf; by the audacity of genius which conceived and projected this work—unprecedented in the history of engineering—these jetties have served every purpose which the conditions demanded.

These walls, but lately finished, have produced a channel where the largest ships of the merchant marine, which seek in any part of the world, come and go laden to their utmost draft without obstruction or question. There is "ample water frontage of sufficient depth and permanence and with currents of moderate rapidity." The rise and fall of the tide is less than 18 inches. Neither the flood nor ebb would disturb a single timber in a basin dock.

This port is admirably situated with respect to the lines of interior communication by rail and stream with the principal sources of supply; for every requirement of this and like character its supply is unlimited in wood and stone at contiguous points.

In timber its resources are boundless in quantity and rich in the kind and quality needed for the work under consideration, and at prices more economical than obtainable at any eligible site in our country. There is pine of the finest quality and oak and cypress and cedar at the very gate of Galveston.

The nature of the ground is most suitable for the construction of excavated docks and basins and for heavy structures. The character and the supply of labor, skilled and unskilled, would be found in abundance to meet every necessity of the Government. The healthfulness of the salubrious climate of the coast of Texas is proverbial—men work out of doors the year round. They are earnest, intelligent, and constant. There is no part of America where the Government would get in men and material a better return for its investment, nor anywhere a more serviceable and satisfactory use of its docking and naval facilities.

No work ever successfully undertaken has more fully accomplished the great purpose for which it was designed than has the establishment at Galveston of a deep-water port of the first class. We have to-day a greater depth of water at mean low tide from the sea to a dock basin in Galveston Bay than any port south of Newport News.

Under these conditions, if we are to consider the shipping of the world that enters this great port, it increases the necessities and makes imperative this construction, not only for the use of the Navy, but for the fleet of merchant marine which come, bearing the flag of every nation, carrying to distant ports of our own and to every foreign land the products of millions of our people.

This commerce has grown so rapidly that only through the energy and enterprise of our most progressive people, alert to their duty and opportunities, has it been encouraged and cared for.

The promise is, the inevitable destiny is, that Galveston must and will become among the foremost factors in attracting the vast fleet of ships that seek our shores. Your cooperation now will only speed the day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope before that ruling is made that on behalf of the committee I may be heard for a moment or two.

The CHAIRMAN. On the point of order the Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to call attention to the fact that we are brought squarely now to meet a question and a point of order which, it seems to me, when clearly analyzed, will be seen to have no foundation in fact, save and except that a wrong ruling, based upon wrong information, or at least upon a wrong foundation, gave rise to it. Let us look at it for a moment. We have here the anomaly that in the Fifty-first Congress, or possibly before that, it was distinctly held that the construction of new vessels was not an item subject to the point of order, and, I believe, immediately followed by the ruling of the same Chairman, Mr. Butterworth, that dry docks were subject to the point of order.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, as a legal proposition and as a logical proposition, that there is no person on top of sod who can reconcile these two things on any sound logic or reasoning, and it is an illustration of the fact that this rule has been followed on the strength of the doctrine of stare decisis, and that is all that it is. All subsequent rulings upon this point have simply followed the original one, without, I submit, any other or any careful reexamination of the facts upon which it was based.

If it is possible for us to construct new vessels, to construct new buildings, new tool shops, in order to complete and repair ships, in the name of reason and common sense why can not we construct scaffolds upon which those ships are to be placed to repair them with the material and tools that we are authorized to buy? That is the position of this question. A dry dock is nothing in its analysis when brought down to its true condition. A statement of what it is simply brings us to the point that it is a scaffold to raise vessels out of the water to clean and repair them, and also, to a certain measure, to be used in the very construction of them. Is it possible, simply because there has been a bad ruling in the past, that that is to be continued, and that another ruling shall not be made?

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to you with the utmost confidence, because I know this fact, that one of these followings of the original ruling was made by you; and I realize the fact, and it seems to me it will be a pleasure to you, upon a thorough examination of the propositions stated in the original ruling, and when you think and consider how flimsy the ground of the original ruling was, and how little logical foundation it had, it seems to me it will be a pleasure for you to destroy that ruling and put the ruling upon reasonable and logical grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The question raised by the point of order to this section is not identical with the other question raised against the provision for more battle ships or the provision for building dry docks. This is a section providing for neither of those purposes. It simply provides for the appointment of a board to determine the desirability of locating and constructing a dry dock at a particular point. It seems to the Chair that that is entirely different from either of the other decisions, and those decisions need not be reviewed in coming to a conclusion upon the point of order here raised, which, it seems to the Chair, must be sustained, because the provision is clearly obnoxious to the rules. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Building a double floor (under the movable floor), 26-inch equatorial dome, double doors at entrance to basement, and alterations to machinery, $1,200.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is not my desire, Mr. Chairman, to take up the time of this committee and to obstruct the proceedings of this legislation. However, I deem it proper at this time to call the attention of members to the fact that we are levying a great deal of taxes upon the people of this nation, taxes, no doubt, most of which they approve.

But, gentlemen, if we are going to continue increasing the burdens of taxation, increasing the number of dollars that our people shall earn in order to pay them into the Treasury to defray these expenses, it is proper and right that you should consider how the people are to find the dollars in the market when they have produced their products and gone to the market in search of dollars with which to pay their taxes. We are levying in round numbers at least $1,000,000,000 as taxes that this Congress will have placed upon the people before we shall have reached the end of the present Congress.

We made an extraordinary appropriation of $50,000,000 for defense just a few days ago which received the unanimous vote of this House and the Senate, and, as I believe, the unanimous support of the entire people of the United States. But while we are thus calling on the people to keep our Treasury supplied with dollars, inasmuch as it has been placed within the power of Congress to coin money, therefore the duty and responsibility of supplying money to the people rests upon Congress as well as the responsibility of levying these taxes; and, in order that the people may be able to find dollars in the market, I have prepared to present an amendment, which I offer at the end of line 22, on page 27. I send my amendment to the Clerk, and ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. One amendment offered by the gentleman is now pending.

Mr. RIDGELY. I withdraw my pro forma amendment and offer this.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will report the amendment which the gentleman has sent to the desk. The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 22, page 27, the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare, issue, place in the Treasury, and pay out in full settlement of all expenses incurred under this act a sufficient amount of Treasury notes in denominations of one, two, five, ten, and twenty dollars. Such Treasury notes shall be receivable in full payment of all private or public debts, dues, and taxes within the United States."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine raises the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up the time of the House in arguing the point of order. I am satisfied that it would be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Machinery plant, navy-yard, Boston, Mass.: Modern machine shop tools, $15,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs if the condition of the navy-yard at Charlestown has been brought to the attention of that committee? I notice in the paragraph which has just been read there is an appropriation of only $15,000. I notice in the paragraph following there is appropriated for additional tools required to put the yard in condition for building and repairing modern marine machinery, including improvements in handling machinery and in the boiler-making plant—new boilers for steam engineering shops, $35,000.

The navy-yard at Boston, Mass., possesses the best opportunity in the world for the repair of all classes of vessels in the naval service. I understand from a high official connected with the Navy Department that vessels are not sent there, for the reason that the machinery plant in operation is not in such condition as to allow those vessels to be repaired. It seems to me that some provision ought to be made for putting the plant in proper order, and I ask the chairman of the committee if that fact has been brought to the attention of the committee?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Was that information of the gentleman obtained from the Bureau of Steam Engineering?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was obtained from the constructor, who said that the Secretary had requested the Bureau of Engineering to see that the plant in the Charlestown Navy-Yard was put in such a condition as to enable all vessels to be sent there for repair. I got the information at such a late day that I was unable to ask for the information until to-day.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The Bureau of Steam Engineering did make an estimate for that very purpose, and we have inserted it in the bill as they have requested.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that the estimate has been to cover all matters that may be necessary.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The Department made an estimate of what they would require and we put it in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The full amount?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The full amount.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, last night a sound of triumphant joy rang through the length and breadth of this land of liberty. The feeling of humiliation which had weighed down American hearts was at last dispelled. Gatherings of gleeful men were seen at every corner with bright and proud faces. The telegraphs were busy conveying this joyful news far and wide to the people of this great Republic.

The Republican majority in this House had arisen in its might and determined to do its duty. A revolt had taken place in the ranks of the Republican party. Early this morning the people hastened to this Hall. They came to hear the rights of the people proclaimed in tones of thunder; they came to be told that the sufferings of the patriots of Cuba had at last reached the ears and hearts of the great Republican party; they came to see patriotism triumphant; they came to see a brave revolt, but they looked down from the galleries to witness a humiliating surrender.

The promised revolt from the Republican party, it seems, was crushed to earth before it commenced, and their solid vote was recorded in opposition to any recognition of freedom for the Cuban patriots.

Mr. Chairman, I have been astonished to hear the people of this country talk about Spain's torpedo fleet crossing the Atlantic. Some people seem to tremble in their shoes because 6 little boats, the largest being but 400 tons and carrying 6 guns and 2 torpedo tubes, are approaching the greatest nation on the earth—a nation with a navy the personnel of which is superior to that of any nation on earth. [Applause.]

I give below a statement of the fleet which left the Canaries, and I see by the press that two of these boats have met with disaster and one has returned to Spain.

Even if they should bring every one of these ships against us, we would be able to meet and triumph over them. It is not action, but inaction, that endangers the honor and prestige of this great nation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, a year ago I proclaimed on this floor that the condition of things in Cuba demanded that the belligerent rights of the patriots should be recognized by us.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly I will.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he really and seriously believes that we shall have war after the action of the House to-day?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I know of no more certain way to bring on war than the action of the Republican party this morning. Already this surrender on the part of the Republican party has been cabled to Madrid, and has, no doubt, encouraged the Spaniards to assume a more defiant attitude. If Congress and the country do their duty, there will not be what we Americans call war. Let us recognize the belligerency of those patriots——

A MEMBER. And independence.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Or independence, if possible, and then, Mr. Speaker, give them arms and ammunition, and in less than three months there will not be a Spanish flag in Cuba. [Applause.] Then it would be very well to send a small army to Puerto Rico and capture their coaling station, and the Spanish flag would be driven across the ocean and remain there forever. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to call attention to the fact that it is not a question of the country doing its duty, but a question of the majority doing its duty.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes; the representatives of the American people should do their duty.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman how much time, in his opinion, considering the prospective alliance between Spain and the United States, it will take these two Governments to put down the patriots in Cuba? [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will reply to the gentleman by saying that while I have bowed my head in humiliation at the course pursued by the Republican party, yet I do not believe matters will go so far that we will continue to extend a friendly hand to the murderers of the brave crew of the Maine and to the murderers of the patriots in Cuba. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman must have a good deal of confidence in human nature. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I have great respect for my Republican friends and every confidence that they will soon be aroused to a sense of duty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Machinery plant, navy-yard, Norfolk, Va.: Additional tools required to put the yard in condition for building and repairing modern marine machinery, including improvements in handling machinery and in the boiler-making plant; new boilers for steam engineering shops, $35,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to amend by striking out the last word; and I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. LENTZ. Now will the gentleman from Alabama permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENTZ. I ask the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has not the floor. A gentleman obtaining the floor under the five-minute rule can not yield his time to another member.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LENTZ. I was about to ask the gentleman from Alabama this question: If, after recognizing Cuban independence, it would take three months to remove the last of the Spanish flags from Cuba, how long will it take to remove from the other side of the House the Spanish flag they have exhibited this afternoon?

Mr. HAMILTON. There is no Spanish flag there.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I can not agree to the assumption that the Spanish flag has any friends on either side of this House. Our friends on the other side are derelict in their duty; they mistake their duty. They believe that the prestige of this country can be maintained by diplomacy. The heart of the American people does not agree with them. The American people believe that a firm, honest stand—obedience to the laws of God and humanity—will give us peace and the approval of the civilized world and Almighty God. [Applause.]

Mr. LENTZ. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me one question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I yield only for a question.

Mr. LENTZ. If after extending to Cuba a recognition of her independence——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Alabama be allowed five minutes additional.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am constrained to object, because I think we ought to proceed with the consideration of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is requested to call the attention of visitors in the gallery to the fact that manifestations of approval or disapproval on their part, of anything that takes place on the floor of the House, are not in order.

Mr. GAINES. Do you want to settle this question on a money basis?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; I want to settle this great question on the basis of honor and humanity. In order to inaugurate some movement in that direction, I introduced this resolution:

Resolved, etc., That a joint committee, consisting of seven members of the Senate, to be appointed in such manner as may be determined by the Senate, and seven members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker, be created to consider the question of our relations with Spain growing out of the Cuban question. That all messages heretofore received or which may hereafter be received from the President referring to this question be referred to said committee. That such committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, to take evidence, and to administer oaths to witnesses. That said committee be authorized to employ a clerk and one assistant, a stenographer and messenger, and that said committee report with as little delay as possible the true conditions which prevail in Cuba, what part of the Spanish debt is a burden to the revenues collected therein, the protection given to Americans and American interests in that island by the Spanish Government, the truth regarding the inhumanities and atrocities which have come to the knowledge of this body through semiofficial and other sources, and any other facts relating to this matter which, in the judgment of the committee, should be considered by Congress.

The committee will, with as little delay as practicable, recommend to Congress what action should be taken by this body. The committee shall have authority to report at any time.

It was my hope that such a committee, which should be composed of the strongest men both in the House and Senate, would be able to force some proper measure through Congress.

I also introduced this joint resolution:

Resolved, etc., That the Government of the United States hereby declares that the struggling patriots in the Island of Cuba are belligerents, and are recognized as such by this Government.

After the course pursued by the Republican party this morning I introduced this bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated to purchase provisions for the use of Cuban noncombatants who have been concentrated in cities and deprived of means of subsistence by order of Spanish commanders. That it be made the duty of the President to immediately cause these provisions to be conveyed to the starving people for whose relief this law is enacted, and to attain this purpose he is authorized and directed to use so much of the military and naval force of the United States as may be necessary.

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized and directed to notify the Government of Spain that this proceeding is an act of humanity on the part of the United States, and is not intended as an act of war.

This by no means meets my views as to the duty of this country, but it is quite evident that we will be fortunate even to get a consideration of this measure.

I am well aware that according to usual rules the landing of the troops of one nation upon the shores of another is a hostile proceeding, but extraordinary, unusual, and unprecedented measures are necessary to meet the unprecedented barbarity of a nation deliberately starving to death its own people, and I say that if Spain chooses to construe this humane and Christian effort as an act of war, then I say let it come. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask to print, in connection with my remarks, a statement of the Spanish navy and a description of the ships now approaching our shores and whose coming seems to be creating apprehension.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What was it that the gentleman from Alabama asked leave to print?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will again state his request.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I desire to print a statement regarding the Spanish navy, and also a description of the fleet now sailing to our shores, together with two measures I have introduced.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on granting the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PAYNE. How many RECORDS will that matter fill?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It will not occupy much space.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. What is the extent of the document which the gentleman desires to print?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. About two pages. Here it is. [Holding up a paper.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not quite understand the gentleman's request. Does the matter he proposes to print include any information about the naval force or military armament of the United States which ought not to be published?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am surprised that the gentleman should ask such a question. I said that I desired to print a statement regarding the Spanish navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Oh, I have no objection, if that will satisfy the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama, and it is granted.

Mr. VINCENT. I would like the gentleman to answer one question before I give my consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. VINCENT. But the gentleman asks unanimous consent to publish something.

Several MEMBERS. That was granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. If there be no objection, the informal amendment offered by him will be considered as withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HULL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 1183. An act for the relief of John Green;

S. 2652. An act granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Emma V. Gile;

S. 2786. An act granting a pension to Martha E. Huddleston;

S. 3169. An act granting a pension to John R. Bevan;

S. 3515. An act granting a pension to Mary L. Page;

S. 2588. An act increasing the pension of Corrissanda L. McGuire, of Shelbyville, Ind.;

S. 3425. An act for the benefit of Evelyn N. Murray;

S. 1928. An act granting an increase of pension to First-class Pilot Capt. James M. Herrington;

S. 285. An act for the relief of Mrs. Mary L. Roderick;

S. 1587. An act granting a pension to Susan C. Oden;

S. 3026. An act granting a pension to Ida Emmott; and

S. 4080. An act providing for a national exposition of American products and manufactures at the city of Philadelphia for the encouragement of the export trade.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

H. R. 6007. An act for the relief of Cora L. Robinson, of Centralia, Kans.;

H. R. 5965. An act granting a pension to Laura A. Barry, as widow of Charles W. Barry, late private, Company B, One hundred and eighth New York Volunteer Infantry;

H. R. 2198. An act granting an increase of pension to Joseph P. Harmon, late private in Company K, Fifth Maine Volunteers, and Company B, Seventh Maine Volunteers;

H. R. 4194. An act granting an increase of pension to Samuel F. Fowler, formerly private Company A, First United States Infantry;

H. R. 907. An act granting a pension to Emily J. Miller;

H. R. 1971. An act to grant a pension to James J. Gibbs, of Knox County, Tenn.;

H. R. 5384. An act for the relief of Jerome A. Stanton, a scout and master of transportation in the Seventh Corps of the armies of the United States;

H. R. 722. An act granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah A. Denny;

H. R. 3299. An act granting a pension to Ellen Day, stepmother to Albert L. Day;

H. R. 4320. An act granting a pension to Nancy Hollenbank, an army nurse during the war of the rebellion;

H. R. 164. An act granting an increase of pension to John P. Thomas;

H. R. 5156. An act granting an increase of pension to Daniel J. Smith;

H. R. 2346. An act to increase the pension of Elwin A. Scutt;
H. R. 6211. An act granting an increase of pension to Isabella G. Daniels, widow of Milton T. Daniels;
H. R. 5964. An act granting a pension to Walter D. Weaver, imbecile and dependent son of George M. Weaver, late Company K, One hundred and eighty-fifth New York Volunteer Infantry;
H. R. 4188. An act granting an increase of pension to Nicholas Gardner;

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOSEPH HAYNESWORTH EARLE, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina, and that it extends to his afflicted family its sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

Resolved further, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of Senator EARLE the legislative business of the Senate be now suspended in order that his associates in this body may pay a tribute to his memory.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit to the family of the deceased certified copies of these resolutions, with statement of the action of the Senate thereon.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further testimonial to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6906) to authorize the Shreveport Bridge and Terminal Company to construct and maintain a bridge across Red River in the State of Louisiana, at or near Shreveport.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Machinery plant, naval station, Port Orchard, Wash.: Machine tools to fit out plant for repairs of engines, boilers, etc., of United States naval vessels, $50,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, on page 40, after line 16, I move to insert the amendment I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:
"Machine plant, naval station, Port Royal, S. C.: Machine tools to properly equip the plant for repairing engines, boilers, etc., of United States naval vessels, $50,000."

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I will reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman, until I hear a statement from the gentleman in reference to this matter.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

The amendment is offered in consequence of a special estimate sent in by the Secretary of the Navy on the 16th instant, which I ask the Clerk to read from the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 16, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, of the 15th instant, submitting an estimate of appropriation, to be included in the naval appropriation bill, for improvement in the machinery plant at the naval station, Port Royal, S. C., $50,000.

Respectfully, yours,
L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 15, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith, for transmission to Congress, to be included in the naval appropriation bill, an estimate of an appropriation of $50,000, required by the Bureau of Steam Engineering of this Department, for improvement in the machinery plant at the naval station, Port Royal, S. C. In this connection, I herewith inclose a copy of a letter from the Engineer in Chief of the Navy, dated the 12th instant, explaining the necessity for this appropriation.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 12, 1898.

SIR: In view of the dredging operations which are taking place which will soon render the dry dock at Port Royal available for the dockage of our ships, and in view of the desirability of having this, the only dock on the Atlantic coast at present capable of taking in the battle ships, ready for the most efficient service, I would respectfully call the Department's attention to the recommendation which I had the honor to make in my annual report of last year with respect to the desirability of providing an adequate machinery plant, capable of making the repairs needed when these vessels are in dock.

Many of the most important repairs can only be made when the vessel is in dock, and unless there is a proper machinery plant near the dock great delay would ensue from having to wait for the repairs to be made elsewhere while the ship remained in dock, not only losing her own services, but also losing the services of the dock, which could have been used for another vessel.

A distinguished officer of a foreign navy wrote some years ago an article in the Journal of the United States Naval Institute, in which he spoke of the desirability of organizing a navy "to be in readiness for the day of battle and the week afterwards."

It is this "week afterwards," during which repairs must be made with the utmost expedition, in order to enable the fleet to be ready for a second engagement, that is of vital importance, and it is on that account that I have the honor to call the Department's attention to the importance of this machinery plant at Port Royal.

Very respectfully,
GEO. W. MELVILLE,
Engineer in Chief, U. S. N., Chief of Bureau.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I hope in view of that statement the objection of the gentleman will be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I shall not make the point of order on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, because of its possible effect upon other legislation. But I desire to say on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs that they have already made what they regard a liberal appropriation for this purpose at Port Royal in a former part of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I will reserve the point of order on the amendment until I hear what the gentleman has to say upon it. I have just come in.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will state frankly—not intending to imply that I was not frank in my statement before—but I would state distinctly that, in my judgment, the point of order will not lie against the amendment. I think that we have a right, under the rules, to appropriate for machinery and tools at any of these stations which we have established. But the committee have not recommended an appropriation for this purpose at the station in question, which station is at present in a crude condition. There is no machine shop there yet.

The House should bear in mind, also, that at all of these stations, when they are equipped, we have machinery, tools, workshops, and necessary facilities of that kind for the several departments of this branch of the service. There is a construction department, which has to do with shipbuilding, ship repairing, and also the repairs of the hulls of ships. In addition, the engineering department have machinery and tools and the facilities necessary for carrying on their business there just the same as at some of the larger yards.

That is a tentative enlargement of the facilities there, and inasmuch as we have no machine shop at that station, yet it has been the policy of the committee from the beginning of the construction of the new Navy to go ahead consecutively in fitting these new places up as rapidly as possible. But in the judgment of the committee it was not desirable or necessary to make an appropriation for a machinery plant there.

I will state, Mr. Chairman, that no estimate was originally sent in for such an improvement. The estimates which have been read here, at the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina, were sent in since Congress met; and I will also say that the committee, for the same reason which actuated them in making a proviso with reference to the appropriation of money for this station and incorporated in a former portion of the bill, inserted a condition with reference to this appropriation which held it subject to the conclusion of the proceedings regarding the title to this site.

The committee determined that until the question of ownership as to the tide-water strip was settled definitely we ought to be more conservative about increasing our expenditures there. That question of title covers the riparian rights to the land from low-water to high-water mark across the entire front of the dock, and it seems to the committee that we should exercise a wise discretion by not enlarging the facilities there and expending a large amount of money until this question of the title was definitely settled.

I do not think, therefore, that this appropriation as proposed by the amendment should go into the bill, and hope the committee will agree with me in that regard.

The disposition, I may say, has been to be absolutely liberal and generous in the treatment of all of these yards, but it must be remembered that this is a new station, not yet developed like that at Norfolk and other places, and hence not of the same importance that all of the bureaus of the different departments should be supplied with the most expensive plants which are found in other stations.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of my amendment.

As regards this being an unimportant dock, I wish to quote from the letter of Commodore Melville the following language:

And in view of the desirability of having this, the only dock on the Atlantic coast at present capable of taking in the battle ships, ready for the most efficient service, etc.

That has the indorsement of the Secretary of the Navy himself, and I do not see how the committee can disregard his official declaration on a matter of so much importance to us at this time.

About the title at the mouth of the dock, I wish to impress on this committee that the Government has owned and has been in possession of that land for fourteen years, that the title was passed upon after the most elaborate consideration by the district attorney and by the Attorney-General, and that it was found that the United States were the owners then and are still the owners of the identical piece of land to which the gentleman from Maine alludes. The proviso requires that the Government should actually purchase and pay for the land which it owns.

But I will not speak further upon that point. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection. The Navy Department is exceedingly anxious that this amendment should be incorporated in the bill, and the Engineer in Chief himself told me that it was most important that this shop, which this very bill provides for, should be equipped with tools. The shop can be completed within three months, but what will be the use of it in this emergency if there is not a tool to be put in it? The Engineer in Chief has also declared that the tools should be at the place where the ship is docked, in order that work may be done that may be demanded by the emergency.

I can not impress too strenuously upon the committee the advisability of making this an efficient dock. It is the only dock in the South, and, so far as I know, on the Atlantic coast, that has ever taken in a battle ship and let it out without any trouble. I ask the Clerk to read from the desk the following letters from the commandant of that station. I hope the committee will listen to these letters, in view of the numerous statements that have been made that this dock can not take in a battle ship.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMANDANT'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES NAVAL STATION,
Port Royal, S. C., March 31, 1896.

SIR: Replying to Bureau's telegram of the 30th instant, directing report in full of all conditions of the dock in docking the Indiana, I have to state that the ship was taken in on the morning tide on the 27th, there being 1 foot 3 inches of water above the ship's draft over the keel blocks. These had been capped with oak, so as to raise them 4½ inches above the dock sill. Under the slope of the bow of the ship the blocks had been built up to fit her shape. Under her heavy turrets the keel blocks had been doubled to support the heaviest weights. The ship came in without the slightest trouble, although the tide had begun to fall before her entrance. When she was finally centered in place ready for landing, and the pumps started, there were still 6 inches of water above her greatest draft aft. She took the blocks fairly and evenly, and is admirably placed, without the least sign of undue strain or pressure anywhere.

Careful measurements with instruments have been made in reference to the dock itself and they show no displacement or settling of the structure whatever. The leakage is normal, the drainage pump controlling it perfectly—not running all the time. The caisson is a perfect and very tight fit, and in all respects, as far as I can discover, the dock fulfills the purpose for which it was constructed. Some additional small facilities in and about the pump house will tend to economy and facility of handling. On these I will report later when the ship is floated.

Respectfully,
C. H. ROCKWELL,
Commander, United States Navy, Commandant.

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read the other letter.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMANDANT'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES NAVAL STATION,
Port Royal, S. C., April 14, 1896.

SIR: In accordance with the Bureau's order by telegraph of the 13th instant, I have the honor to report that the U. S. S. Indiana having finished the painting and other work on the 6th instant, the dock was flooded to within a foot of low-tide mark to wet the paint, which is supposed to benefit it.

On the 7th the tide was not quite high enough to take the ship out of the dock. On the morning of the 8th high water occurred before daylight and was sufficient for the purpose, but it was deemed best to wait until the evening tide. At 4.30 p. m., on the 8th, the ship was floated, hauled out of the dock, and proceeded under her own steam to an anchorage in the bay. While hauling into the dock, while in the dock, and hauling out, the ship received no damage in any way, no defacement or scratching; in fact, she did not, as far as known, touch any wharf, wing dam, abutment or other part of the structure, but proved conclusively that going into and coming out of this dock is easy and feasible at all times, this battle ship entering and leaving the dock with no trouble or delay of any kind and as easily and readily as a boat would have done.

Respectfully,
C. H. ROCKWELL,
Commander, United States Navy, Commandant.

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I wish to add but a single word. The only thing that was necessary to be done to make that dock available at all times was a small amount of dredging at the entrance of the dock, which has been completed, and there is now 30 feet of water at the entrance to the dock.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. CUMMINGS addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I should like the courtesy that is usually extended to a member of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Although I applied for recognition, I would recognize the justice of the gentleman's plea, and I will yield to him and come after.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair desires to state before the gentleman proceeds, the gentleman from New York having made a rather unjust insinuation toward the Chair——

Mr. CUMMINGS. I deny it. The Chair made an ungentlemanly recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois had asked for recognition before the gentleman from New York, and the Chair told him he would recognize him.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I had been on my feet for ten minutes before the gentleman from Illinois asked for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire the floor?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I shall heartily support this amendment. The Port Royal dock is the nearest dock to the Key West fleet. It is the nearest dock for the repair of a man-of-war if disabled in action around Havana. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] tells us that the plant for this work can be completed within three months. You will need it before the three months are over, Mr. Chairman. That there will be war between this country and Spain is indicated by every pulsation of the popular heart to-day. I have received from my own constituents this batch of letters in one mail, asking me why my voice is silent at this time, asking me why I remain silent after I have visited Cuba and know the facts.

Mr. Chairman, I remain silent because, under the rules of a former House, adopted under false pretenses by this House [applause], my wrists are gyved, my lips are sealed, and my mouth is padlocked.

I will say further to the constituents who are writing me every hour that to-day I besought the Speaker of the House to give me an opportunity to tell what I saw, not what I heard, and was told that at the proper time the opportunity would be given me.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Next year.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Representative from the First district of Maine is to decide what is the proper time and not the Representative of the Tenth district of New York.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall not vote for any appropriation of $400,000 to feed the reconcentrados of Cuba until this Government explicitly says to Blanco and to Sagasta, "Repeal your Weyler order, under which these people are starving." [Applause.] There was the place to have taken the initiative. Make them repeal that murderous order of General Weyler. It is still in force, and thousands are dying under its provisions, among them American citizens. From even a Spanish or a Weyler standpoint the order is no longer necessary.

Why is it still in force? Weyler said that he made it with the object of destroying the source of supplies for the Cuban patriots in the provinces of Pinar del Rio, Havana, Matanzas, Santa Clara, and in Puerto Principe. Well, the sources of supplies are already destroyed. There are no provisions there—none growing, none planted. There are not 50 acres in all these provinces planted with provisions. The country is devastated and ruined. It is an utter impossibility, unless they bring their provisions with them, for Gomez and Garcia to again march into the western provinces of Cuba.

Therefore I say that the initiative should be a peremptory demand by this Government for the repeal of the Weyler order. When that is done, feed the reconcentrados, if you please. Give them hoes, give them plows, give them oxen, and in God's name when you send them back to the blackened ashes of their homes, give them the opportunity to raise provisions for themselves. [Applause.]

I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, to have the privilege of addressing the House and of telling what I saw in Cuba in the regular way. I should be glad even now, if I had the consent of the House, to go on and describe what I saw. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed without limit. Is there objection?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I think the sense of the committee is very strong against being unfair——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I object.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to continue his remarks for half an hour.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am sure that my friend——

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to ask the Chairman if my time has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am sure my colleague on the committee understands exactly my situation.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If you prefer it the other way, I do not desire to and would not crowd myself on the attention of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I know he will not want to delay this appropriation bill a moment. There will be plenty of other opportunities, as he knows.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to continue his remarks for half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to continue his remarks for half an hour. Is there objection?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If the gentleman from New York on this occasion thinks it wise——

A MEMBER. I object.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will not crowd in if the gentleman desires to go on with his appropriation bill. I am a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and would not antagonize its chairman if he desires to proceed with his bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do. I think it is proper to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. CANNON. Only a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I find, on inquiry, that Port Royal dry dock has been appropriated for already in this bill, with a proviso, namely:

That before the money shall be spent the title in front of the dock shall be obtained.

Now, this proposition for $50,000, if I understand it, is to put machinery into the shop. I do not believe it wise. The shop, I am told, is not built; second, the title has not been obtained; third, there is not sufficient depth of water; fourth, dry docks have been authorized upon this bill; and they were provided for on the statement that the dry dock at Port Royal has not sufficient water to make its use practical. Now, you can blow in this $50,000 for a shop, but if I am correctly informed you had just as well put it in a blacksmith shop in central Indiana, so far as caring for the Navy is concerned.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The purpose of my amendment is not to build a shop, but is for tools to put in the shop authorized in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; it is a provisional shop.

Mr. ELLIOTT. No, it is not. It is a part of the regular establishment.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the shop is not built yet; the title is not obtained; yet the gentleman brings here now, from somebody, a letter that goes on and says that this is the best dry dock in the country.

Mr. ELLIOTT. From Commodore Melville.

Mr. CANNON. When the country has been possessed of the knowledge for months that it could not be used, and we had to send the Indiana to Halifax to be docked. What is the fact; what is the truth about it? It seems to me that this amendment ought not to be made. It was not estimated for. Now, the gentleman has got somebody to send in an estimate——

Mr. ELLIOTT. That "somebody," Mr. Chairman, is the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CANNON. Since that time.

Mr. ELLIOTT. How can the gentleman speak of the Secretary of the Navy in such language?

Mr. CANNON. I say it was not estimated for in the regular estimates. And let me say to my friend I do not know about this Navy matter, but I do know a hustling member of Congress can get a letter from somebody here or somebody there in charge, and anybody can get an estimate from the Departments that is for its use; so you see how your estimate is worked.

Mr. GAINES. Is that the way in which the estimate was made for the Klondike appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. For the Klondike!

Mr. GAINES. Now they want to put a lot of machinery down there in that shop so that they can go to work, and you do not want to do it.

Mr. CANNON. As to whether the appropriation for the Klondike was wise or unwise, is the setting up of an offset for an appropriation not authorized by good public service high statesmanship?

Mr. GAINES. But the point is, you got the appropriation first.

Mr. CANNON. Is that fair? Is that the kind of statesmanship the bright light of Tennessee wants to exhibit?

Mr. GAINES. What is that?

Mr. CANNON. I will not repeat it.

Mr. GAINES. There is a lot of patriotism and consistency in the "bright light of Tennessee," at all events.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe this appropriation ought to be made; and having said so, I shall vote against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I object, and want to speak against the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to impress upon this committee that the person about whom the gentleman from Illinois has spoken in such disparaging terms is the Secretary of the Navy, and he indorsed a letter of Commodore Melville upon this subject, and sent it in on the 16th of this month, and sent it here, if I can impress it upon gentlemen, to meet the very emergency upon us. How can anything come to this House with more force than that? A letter written by the old hero, Commodore Melville, and indorsed by the Secretary of the Navy! And yet the gentleman from Illinois would try to place the committee under the impression that I had gone to the Department and got this indorsement from "somebody," as he says. The very methods of the gentleman from Illinois in trying to defeat this amendment should impress the committee with its reasonableness and the fact that it should be adopted.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The gentleman from Illinois states that the appropriation for the improvement of this dry dock is made conditional upon the acquisition of title before it is expended.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is another appropriation, I will say.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Is not that an unwise restriction, if it be true that Port Royal is the only dry dock for our ships south of New York?

Mr. LENTZ. Ought not that restriction to be removed?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I did my best to defeat it the other day, but I could not get the committee to take any notice of the point. I do not believe the committee ever appreciated what they were doing. Now, here is this dock that is admitted to be the only one south of New York or Norfolk that can take in a battle ship.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. There is one of the largest docks in the country south of New York at Norfolk.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Now, this dock has taken in the Indiana, as I had read from the Clerk's desk a moment ago. "She was taken in and let out with as much ease as a small boat, without a scratch," as Captain Rockwell said, and yet it has been published abroad throughout the land that that dock is unfit for service, all of it done by rival concerns that never have been willing to admit that the dock was efficient for service; and yet here is one of the largest battle ships afloat that went in and came out of it without a scratch, as the commandant says, and still the House refuses to do anything in regard to it, and the committee ignores this special recommendation made by Secretary Long. Let me repeat, in view of this emergency——

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. I understand they are dredging around this dock, and parties owning the land will not allow them to throw the dredging on this mosquito bar unless they buy it, and they will not sell it at a price except five or six times what it is worth.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The Government has owned and paid for that piece of land. It has owned it for fourteen years.

Mr. STEELE. Just where the dock is?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes; at the mouth of the dock. That is an absurd claim and has been brought up by somebody; I do not know what their object is.

Mr. STEELE. Have they not had the title of the land in litigation?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No litigation about the title; they commenced the suit in the Court of Claims six years ago for use and occupation. Nobody attached the slightest importance to it. The Government owns the land; they bought it fourteen years ago, after an examination of the title by the United States authorities, the district attorney and the Attorney-General.

Mr. BRUCKER. For what purpose, will the gentleman state, did the Government purchase it?

Mr. ELLIOTT. For a naval station and the building of a dry dock.

Mr. BRUCKER. How long ago?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Fourteen years ago.

Mr. STEELE. I am told that this suit is still pending in the Court of Claims and has not been adjudicated.

Mr. ELLIOTT. It has not been adjudicated. It is a suit for use and occupation, and I showed to the House the other day that it can not be maintained, and must be dismissed when it is brought to trial on account of lack of jurisdiction in the court.

Mr. STEELE. If it is not maintainable, it is surprising that it has not been brought up and dismissed before.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Now, the Government has spent upon this dock five or six hundred thousand dollars. Is it to be thrown away simply because somebody brings a groundless suit against the Government? Whoever heard of Congress inserting in a bill an acknowledgment that an antagonist claiming land against the Government had a good title? The Department is required in the bill to buy the very land the Government owns and has a good title to. It is absurd.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman from South Carolina permit me?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I should like to ask if the battle ship

Indiana has been in the dry dock at Port Royal since her bilge keels have been put on?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No; but the Bunce board——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I would like, Mr. Chairman, sufficient time to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks sufficient time to answer the question of the gentleman from New Jersey. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is it possible for the Indiana to go into that dry dock with her bilge keels on?

Mr. ELLIOTT. With an expenditure of $200.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Can she go into the dock at the present time?

Mr. ELLIOTT. She can with an expenditure of $200. The Department assured me the other day that work could be done immediately, and if that work is done she can go in. It will not require any appropriation. The recommendation of the Bunce dry dock board, which gave it their attention, states that all that is necessary to let the Indiana in with the bilge keels on is to spend $200 in cutting away a part of the altars. The following letters bear on the above question:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., March 12, 1898.

SIR: In reply to your request upon the inclosed letter of Representative H. C. LOUDENSLAGER, I have the honor to state that the claim of Agnes A. Niver vs. The United States, No. 17756, now pending in the Court of Claims, was commenced in September, 1893. It is a claim for the use and occupation by the United States of a certain piece of land lying near the dry dock of the United States at Port Royal. The claimant alleges title in herself, but so far has failed to present any proof of title, although during the long interval since the petition was filed she has introduced some evidence.

On the part of the Government the claim of title is also made under a deed, which, on its face and according to a complete abstract of title which has been prepared for the use of the Government, seems to show a good title in the United States. I am strongly inclined to think that the claimant can not prove title, but is endeavoring to bring about some sort of compromise, which seems to be evidenced by the long delay in presenting her proofs, and the fact that as yet she has not produced any evidence of her title.

At this time an attorney in the employ of this Department is investigating the matter carefully at Charleston, S. C., with a view to attending, on behalf of the United States, at the taking of further depositions for the claimant. Although the case seems to have been long delayed, this is due entirely to the inaction of the claimant, and in no sense is it the fault of the defense.

With regard to the question asked by Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, why the Government has not proceeded to obtain title to the land, presumably by condemnation proceedings, the answer is that as far as known the United States already has a good title, which is undoubtedly the reason why, although condemnation proceedings relating to other pieces of land in the near vicinity of this have heretofore been had and have now been completed, no action of the kind has been done with reference to this piece.

Very respectfully,

L. A. PRADT,
Assistant Attorney-General.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD, New York, September 28, 1897.

SIR: Complying with your instructions, I respectfully submit herewith drawing showing section of timber dry dock at the United States naval station, Port Royal, S. C., showing altars, from the sixth to ninth, inclusive, to be cut out on both sides of the dock to the line of the inner toe of the altars in order to clear the bilge keels of a battle ship on the blocks.

The estimated cost of drawing out spikes, hewing the altars, as shown in the drawings, and respiking the altars for a distance of 100 feet on each side is about $200.

Very respectfully,

A. G. MENOCAL,
Civil Engineer, United States Navy.

Commodore BUNCE,
Senior Member of Board on Dry Docks.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this paragraph.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments are exhausted.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the informal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT].

The question was taken; and upon a division (demanded by Mr. ELLIOTT) there were—ayes 90, noes 88.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Tellers, Mr. Chairman!

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine and Mr. ELLIOTT.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 117, noes 104.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Pay of professors and others, Naval Academy: For one professor of mathematics, one of chemistry, one of physics, and one of English, at $2,500 each; five professors, namely, one of French and Spanish, one of English, two of French, and one of drawing, at $2,200 each, one assistant professor of French, at $1,800; one sword master, at $1,500, and two assistants, at $1,000 each; one instructor in gymnastics, at $1,200; one assistant librarian, at $1,400; one secretary to the Naval Academy, at $1,800; two clerks to the Superintendent, at $1,200 each; one clerk to the commandant of cadets, at $1,200; one clerk to the paymaster, at $1,200; one dentist, at $1,600, one baker, at $600; one mechanic in department of physics, at $730; one cook, at $325.50; one messenger to the superintendent, at $600; one armorer, at $949.50; one chief gunner's mate, at $529.50; one quarter gunner, at $469.50; one coxswain, at $469.50; one seaman in the department of seamanship, at $397.50; one attendant in the department of astronomy and one in the department of physics, at $300 each; six attendants at recitation rooms, library, store, chapel, and offices, at $300 each; one bandmaster, at $528; twenty-one first-class musicians, at $348 each; seven second-class musicians, at $300 each; services of organist at chapel, $300; in all, $54,507.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, page 42, after the word "at," strike out "$1,400" and insert "$1,800;" so as to read "one assistant librarian, at $1,800."

Mr. CANNON. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment advisedly, with no purpose of delay, but with the simple object of doing justice. I have conferred with the members of the committee, and I believe they will agree with me that the proposition is not an unjust one, but perfectly fair. The only objection that can be raised to it is that other employees about the Naval Academy are also requesting an advance of their salaries. But I desire to call attention particularly to this case. By looking over the amount of salary given to each of these employees, it will be noticed that the swordmaster is receiving more than the librarian, although the work of the latter is more arduous and more difficult than that of almost any other man in the Academy.

His services to those engaged in instruction in that institution are constantly in demand. No man, unless he has had the experience of years, can be at all fitted for that position. Yet you pay men who are teachers of Spanish in that school nearly twice the amount that you do this man. I only ask in the name of justice that the man who renders this valuable service, who is at all times ready to furnish any information that may be needed in the interests of that Academy, shall receive a fair and honest compensation for what he does.

Mr. LENTZ. Does the gentleman state that the salaries of some other employees in that institution have been increased in this bill?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I can not tell the gentleman whether they have been or not. But for more than ten years it has been known that the salary of this officer is wholly inadequate; that he has not been receiving an equivalent for the services he has been rendering. It is but simple justice that this slight increase should be made in his behalf.

One word further. This man is not housed and quartered by the Government, but is compelled to live outside of the Academy. His services are of such a nature that I think every person who has visited the Academy, especially members on this floor, ought to know that no man within the walls of that institution renders as much service for so small an amount of pay.

I regret that this case can not at this time receive more serious consideration.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, the amount appropriated by this bill as salary for this officer corresponds with the estimate sent in by the Department. I understand that the person now holding this office has held it for a great many years, and has received each year the sum of $1,400. He is no doubt an efficient employee. One thousand four hundred dollars is the amount which has been estimated by the Department for this salary and the amount which he has been receiving for years. The Department has requested no increase, and, so far as I know, no such request has come from anyone except the gentleman himself.

There were before the committee numerous requests for increase of salaries, but, so far as I recollect, the committee did not in a single instance make any such increase. There is no more reason, so far as I can see, why the amount estimated by the Department should be increased in this instance than in a great many others to which the attention of the committee was called.

Mr. DINGLEY. The amount of salary named in the bill, as I understand, is the salary which has been fixed in the several appropriation bills from year to year.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Yes, sir; I think for fifteen or twenty years.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then it is the salary fixed by law.

Mr. SOUTHARD. And it is the amount estimated by the Department this year.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Does the gentleman from Maine raise the point that because this amount of salary has been appropriated from year to year, the salary is fixed by law at that amount?

Mr. DINGLEY. The salaries of all the officials of the Government, except those holding the more important positions, are fixed by appropriation bills from year to year.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Does the gentleman raise the point that the appropriation of a given amount from year to year for the compensation of a public officer fixes that as the legal salary and that this committee can not change it?

Mr. LENTZ. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] this question: As I understand him, this librarian has been drawing for quite a number of years this salary of $1,400.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I think for fifteen or twenty years.

Mr. LENTZ. And no other employee has had any increase in this bill?

Mr. SOUTHARD. No others.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Oh, yes.

Mr. LENTZ. But there has been an increase in the purchasing power of the dollar, which means a good deal in these days.

Mr. SOUTHARD. This man has had the benefit of that increase like the others.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] insist upon the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to be informed whether there is some general statute fixing the salary of this official.

Mr. CANNON. If there is no statute providing for the salary of this officer, then the salary appropriated from year to year in the appropriation bills is to be regarded as the legal salary; and on that ground this amendment ought to be ruled out.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question about that.

Mr. HANDY. His place might be provided for by statute without fixing the salary.

Where is the law it changes, I would ask the gentleman? It is incumbent on the gentleman making the point of order upon a proposition to point out the law which he claims it will change.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I have already pointed out the law. If the law provides, for instance, that he shall have $1,400 a year, and you undertake to make an appropriation of $1,800 a year, you change the law.

Mr. HANDY. But the law does not provide anything of the kind. I have asked the gentleman to show us what law does provide that. Now, if the law does not provide anything for next year he would have nothing.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The appropriation bills fix the salary at so much per annum.

Mr. HANDY. Can you point to the law?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Oh, yes; there is no question of that. The last appropriation bill is the law governing it for the present.

Mr. HANDY. Let us hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a further amendment here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in line 21, page 42, after the word "at," by striking out the words "three hundred and ninety-seven dollars and fifty-cents" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500."

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SOUTHARD. I desire to reserve the point of order upon that, or I will make the point of order now, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman, perhaps, is rather late in making the point of order. The gentleman from California had been recognized.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I addressed the Chair immediately after the reading of the amendment, and the Chair failed to hear me.

The CHAIRMAN. On the statement of the gentleman the Chair will hold that the point of order may be reserved.

[Mr. MAGUIRE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. I understand the amount provided in this bill is in excess of the wages of ordinary seamen.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I do not care to press a vote upon the question or to oppose the point of order, for it seems to fall within the rule laid down a moment ago upon the other amendment. So I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs, Naval Academy: Necessary repairs of public buildings, pavements, wharves, and walls inclosing the grounds of the Naval Academy, improvements, repairs, furniture and fixtures, $21,000; new fire and flushing system and other sanitary purposes, $15,750; relaying brick sidewalks adjacent to Naval Academy walls in streets of Annapolis, $3,500; repaving Maryland avenue within the Naval Academy, $4,000; relaying sidewalk from Maryland avenue to cadet quarters, $1,282; repairing Santee's wharf, $2,500; necessary dredging and improvement of north water front, $10,000; in all, $58,032.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 15, page 44, after the word "dollars," insert the following:

"For the erection of new buildings at and for the use of the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., of the character and to the extent that the Secretary of the Navy may in his judgment deem necessary and practicable under the appropriation, in accordance with plans to be determined upon by the Secretary, and for the removal of such old buildings as may, in the judgment of said Secretary, be necessary to be removed for the convenient and suitable location and construction of the said new buildings, $500,000."

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. I make the point of order, if nobody else does.

Mr. MUDD. Is not that too late?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman is not too late.

Mr. CANNON. I make the point of order. If the gentleman wants to be heard——

Mr. MUDD. I do not offer the amendment for the purpose of getting into the RECORD, and if the gentleman from Illinois wants to make the point of order, it is just as well that it should be decided now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard upon this point of order. It seems to me that the pertinency of this amendment has been already decided in this Congress. In the Forty-ninth Congress a question arose, which certainly is analogous, as to whether or not the point of order would lie against an appropriation for the building of new battle ships that had not in any sense been authorized by law. Now, it seems to me that it is just as reasonable and just as much within the purview of the rule that we should put up new buildings at the Naval Academy as that we should build ships for the Navy.

In the Forty-ninth Congress, with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. McCreary, in the chair, there was an amendment offered to the naval appropriation bill of the following character and in the following language:

For the construction of 2 swift double-bottomed steel cruisers, each of about 4,000 tons displacement, of the type of the Newark, except boilers and machinery; 4 of about 1,700 tons displacement each, of the type of gunboat No. 1, and 1 swift torpedo boat, said vessels to cost all together, exclusive of armament, not more than $4,950,000, $2,470,000 is hereby appropriated.

The point of order was made against it by Mr. Holman, of Indiana. The chairman of the committee, Mr. McCreary, of Kentucky, quoting with approval a decision that had been made by the then Speaker, Mr. Carlisle, decided that the appropriation was in order, because it was in view of the general purpose of the maintenance of a navy.

Mr. Chairman, there is no need of any special authorization by act of Congress for these buildings. The Constitution of the United States empowers Congress to provide and maintain a navy. Provision and maintenance are arrived at by appropriation, and if there were no act of Congress establishing the Naval Academy, I contend that Congress should make an appropriation for the putting up of the necessary buildings for the quartering of the cadets at the Academy.

But, Mr. Chairman, an appropriation that more closely resembles this was made in the Fiftieth Congress, to which I shall refer—an appropriation for West Point. I beg the attention of the committee very briefly to this. I wish also to observe in citing the decision which I have already referred to, which is to be found on page 2337 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Appendix, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, that the ruling of the Chair then made was approved by Mr. Randall, who had been a Speaker of this House, and an amendment recommending still further appropriations of the same character was made by the present Chairman of this committee, who, to that extent at least, indirectly and inferentially gave the sanction of his judgment in favor of the pertinency of such an amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in the Fiftieth Congress, second session, there was a decision which, it seems to me, bears almost immediately upon this point. In the appropriation for the Military Academy at West Point there was a clause which I will ask the Clerk to read, because I think the Clerk can be heard better than I can. It will be found on page 716 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fiftieth Congress, second session, and the decision on the page following.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Was that in the first session of the Fiftieth Congress?

Mr. MUDD. In the second session.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Was the point of order raised against it?

Mr. MUDD. Yes; according to my recollection, not by the committee, but by some one outside of the committee. I ask the committee to give attention to the reading of the paragraph in point.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the erection of a fireproof building on such site of the public grounds at West Point, N. Y., as may be designated by the Secretary of War, to accommodate all the departments of instruction of the Military Academy, to be constructed according to the plans recommended by the academic board and approved by the Secretary of War, $490,000: Provided, That plans and specifications for said building shall be prepared under the direction of the academic board and approved by the Secretary of War, which plans and specifications shall be such that when said building shall be fully completed the cost thereof shall not exceed the sum herein appropriated.

Mr. MUDD. Now, Mr. Chairman, there was an appropriation almost identical with that proposed to-day.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is impossible to hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order. The gentleman will suspend until the committee comes to order. Will gentlemen suspend talking on the floor?

Mr. MUDD. In the case in the Fiftieth Congress, Mr. Chairman, provision was made for a new building, an entirely new building, on plans and specifications to be made by the Secretary of War, for the Military Academy. I am trying to incorporate a provision for a new building, under plans and specifications to be made by the Secretary of the Navy, for the Naval Academy. The two cases are precisely analogous, and the rule which applies to the one certainly applies to the other. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was Mr. Cox, of New York.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentlemen at the desk do not suspend talking they will not be able to hear this very able argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana insists upon order. So does the Chair. If gentlemen can not delay the transaction of their business, they will kindly retire from the floor.

Mr. MUDD. As I was about to state, Mr. Chairman, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union at that time, and during the pendency of that bill, was Mr. Cox, of New York, and he decided that the section that I had read at the Clerk's desk was in order under the first branch of the rule, because it was provided for by law as being for the general maintenance of the Military Academy, and also within the exception, which says that appropriations shall not be made except for such "public works and objects as are already in progress," the Chair, in both cases which I have referred to, using the language substantially that the Navy in the one case and the Military Academy in the other was a "public work" or "object" already in progress.

In the Fiftieth Congress I find in the discussion the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] spoke in favor of the ruling made by the Chair, and quite a number of other gentlemen prominent in the House. I will simply ask the Clerk to read now one paragraph giving the language of the ruling of the Chair upon the point made against the appropriation in the case last referred to, and I will leave the matter for the Chair's decision.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Without regard to the precedent cited by the gentleman from Illinois, the Chair decides that, within the meaning of the provision just read, the building proposed to be erected—fireproof building on site of public grounds at West Point—is within the purview of the rule. The construction of a building is an incident to the maintenance of the Academy itself, the object being already in progress—the main object contemplated not only by the bill but by the very institution of the Academy itself.

Mr. MUDD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that a provision for a necessary building at the Naval Academy for the cadets to live in and work in while in pursuit of their vocation there is certainly in strict accordance with the rule under which this point of order is sought to be availed of.

Mr. CANNON. I only desire to submit a word. If that ruling just read is a proper ruling and the gentleman's amendment is a proper amendment under Rule XXI, then you can build any public building connected with the public service anywhere without separate authorization by a provision on a general appropriation bill.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes. For instance, the Post-Office exists by law, the postal service exists by law, the Treasury Department exists by law; and now if this construction of buildings, half a million dollars' worth, not repair, but construction of new buildings, is an incident to the establishment of the Naval Academy, then the construction of any public building in the United States, anywhere upon public ground, in connection with any public work, is incident to the public service.

Now, a bare statement of the facts and the principle shows that this decision was wrong, and this amendment is wrong under this rule of law. Now, then, you may say that Mr. Cox was an eminent parliamentarian. Yes; a clever man; dead and gone; and I will not discuss him. I will merely discuss the fact, and call attention to the fact that every member of this House has got to stand out on his public building, in connection with the Treasury, almost every member, or a majority of them, in the public service, because there is no law authorizing it. Now, then, I make that issue.

Mr. STEELE. There is a special reason why they should have an additional appropriation at Annapolis, but I think $500,000 is entirely too much.

Mr. MUDD. That is not the point.

Mr. STEELE. I think there would not have been such a point made if you had asked for a reasonable amount. We have had one building there so ruined that it can not be occupied, and it would not be wise to repair it; and I think if the gentleman would make a reduction of $450,000 and ask for $50,000 to repair a couple of buildings the point of order would not be made, because there ought really to be some repairs or a new building down there.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state on behalf of the bill and of the committee that the reason why such an appropriation as this, in the opinion of the committee, ought not to go into this bill is found in the fact that for several years past there have been reports made and suggestions——

Mr. MUDD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. You can not comment on anything, because I have said nothing. [Laughter.]

Mr. MUDD. I admit the gentleman has said nothing. I understand the gentleman from Illinois refused to reserve the point of order, and the question now is whether the Chair will sustain the formal point of order, and not whether the point ought to be made or not.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Was that the question you wanted to ask me?

Mr. MUDD. I wanted to suggest to you that you were speaking of the propriety of putting up a building.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine wish to discuss further the point of order?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I desire to say that there is already a comprehensive proposition for the reorganization——

Mr. HANDY. I call the gentleman to order. He is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then I will defer to the gentleman from Delaware and take the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HANDY. That is some good I have done in my public service. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. There are all sorts of ways of getting advertised. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair, following the precedent cited, the decision of Chairman Cox, will overrule the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine was recognized.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, have not I the floor, having offered an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized, and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state very briefly——

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege. We want to hear Mr. HANDY on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware seldom has any trouble in making himself heard. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOVE. Mr. Chairman, I want to know what the ruling of the Chair was.

The CHAIRMAN. Will gentlemen resume their seats and cease conversation? If the committee would maintain order, there would be no need of the gentleman rising and asking that question.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state now that there has been presented to the Committee on Naval Affairs a proposition for the complete reorganization and rebuilding of the institution at Annapolis known as the Naval Academy. The Board of Visitors have reported in favor of it. The officers there have strongly recommended it. Tentative plans and diagrams have been made concerning it, and this proposition involves an entire realignment of the structures and an entire change of the relative positions of the buildings, and beyond that involves more or less the extension of the water front. The Committee on Naval Affairs have made appropriation heretofore to extend the water front. We have made such appropriations as should properly be made, in our judgment, without interfering with the operation of these proposed changes when a comprehensive plan should be adopted.

Mr. McINTIRE. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. When I get through.

Mr. McINTIRE. I wanted a reply to an inquiry in regard to a matter you have alluded to. Is it not true that those comprehensive plans of reorganization of the buildings have been in possession of the committee over three years?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not think it is necessary to answer that question, because it is not pertinent to what I was saying.

Mr. McINTIRE. Have they not been in your hands——

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. They have not been in my hands at all.

Mr. McINTIRE. In the hands of your committee?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If the gentleman wants to try me, that is one thing. If that is what he wanted me to yield him fifteen minutes for, I will revise my decision. It makes no difference where the plans are, or what became of them. The recommendation is there. I do not know myself how it would be practicable to tear down certain buildings at the Academy now on a large scale and replace them with new buildings without putting new structures in such a position as would interfere with the carrying out of this general plan.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, realizing that large emergency appropriations were required this year, have not felt that it was desirable or justifiable for us to incorporate into the annual appropriation bill any such comprehensive and expensive plan as that proposed for the Naval Academy, which involved in the estimate of expenditure, not all at once, but an inauguration of a general plan that in carrying out would cost some $6,000,000. Now that there is need of repairs there, we know perfectly well——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman let me interrupt him?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. If the gentleman will let me complete my sentence——

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I did.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Then I will stop in the middle of it.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Is it not true—can you not state of your own positive knowledge—that the buildings at Annapolis now are in danger of falling down and bringing a catastrophe upon the men of this country who are there?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. This bill carries a provision for such repairs as are necessary and as the committee deemed wise.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Am I not right?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I do not know whether you are right about it or not as you state it. I do not think I ought to be asked to indorse your statement.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I do not want your indorsement.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The report made to us was that the buildings there were in very bad condition, and, if I mistake not, this bill makes provision for certain repairs. What I have stated is true just the same, and the reason why we have not appropriated $500,000 or any large sum is, as I have stated, because it is recommended in the highest quarters, and, as I understand, it is contemplated to reorganize the situation of that Academy on an entirely different basis from that which exists to-day.

Mr. HANDY. Can not that reorganization be done under this amendment?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I think it hardly could.

Mr. HANDY. It certainly can.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The gentleman probably knows more about this subject than I do, as he possibly does on other subjects.

Mr. HANDY. I hope the gentleman is not trying to compliment me.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I am glad the gentleman has got into the RECORD with another exhibition of his native courtesy and refinement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has expired.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the proposition embraced in this amendment is as meritorious as almost any that could be submitted to this Congress. If the Government of the United States is to maintain a navy, it follows that the Navy must have officers—competent and skilled officers—to command it. These officers must be educated and trained to the duties and responsibilities of their positions. They must be so educated and trained at what we term the Naval Academy—the only institution supported and controlled by the Government where suitable naval instruction is given.

Now, if we are to rear and instruct young men to become the future officers of our naval force, I think it may be fairly conceded that they ought to have decent quarters in which to reside in comfort and respectability, and proper buildings, with all the necessary equipments and appliances, in which they may do the work assigned them as part of the instruction for the branch of service to which they devote their lives. They have not such accommodations now at the Naval Academy, either as to the buildings in which they lodge and live when not on duty or those in which they labor and receive their tuition.

The needs of this Academy in the line of new buildings, as well as the appropriations necessary to respond to these needs, have been recognized and pointed out by several Secretaries of the Navy and by several Boards of Visitors to the Naval Academy in the last few years, in reports made and resolutions adopted by the unanimous vote of the said boards. The Boards of Visitors to this Academy are constituted in part of United States Senators and Members of this House; and among those who, as members of the House, have concurred in the recommendations for new buildings at Annapolis, I refer to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. SAYERS, the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. MEYER, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FOSS, from all of whom I trust this amendment will receive earnest and consistent support.

The buildings urgently needed at this time, as specifically set forth by the Secretary of the Navy in a communication to the Naval Committee of this House and the Naval Committee of the Senate—a communication bearing date the 8th of January of the present year—are an armory, a boathouse, and a power house. The necessity and the functions of such buildings as these, with the intricate machinery and mechanical appliances incident and requisite thereto, in a naval training institution, I do not feel called upon to make any argument to explain or impress upon the attention of the House. The Secretary of the Navy, in a paper which I have before me—Senate Document No. 55—states in reference to the armory and boathouse—I will not advert to the statements of the Secretary in regard to other buildings which are needed—that they are unsafe and liable to fall in at any time.

His exact language, which is found upon page 2 of said document, as to these two buildings, is as follows:

> The following important buildings have been surveyed and found to be unsafe: (1) The armory, which was abandoned until supported by the erection of heavy timber props along the western wall; (2) the boathouse, which was declared unsafe for many of its original purposes and unworthy of repair.

Now, the Secretary of the Navy says that the armory and boathouse, in their present condition, are unsafe and in danger of falling down. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] have made the same statement, in reference to the same buildings, much more forcibly even than the Secretary of the Navy himself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that Congress will not regard that as a wasteful and extravagant appropriation of money which provides at the Naval Academy buildings which are so essential to the proper prosecution of the special and distinctive course of studies which makes up the education of the cadets; will not characterize that as an unnecessary appropriation which provides buildings that will protect these young men from exposure, while undergoing their studies and performing the duties that equip them for our future naval commanders, to the danger of loss of life by the falling down of buildings over their heads.

The Secretary of the Navy, realizing the needs of the Academy and stating them as strongly as they can be stated and the miserable condition of dilapidation which prevails in those buildings now, has asked for and formally recommended an appropriation of $500,000 to be made in this bill; just the appropriation which my amendment contemplates.

We have listened to and heeded and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has been pleased to listen to and heed the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy in other lines. Why not pay equal respect to his recommendations in reference to these buildings—recommendations fortified by evidence furnished by the eyesight of every man who has placed his foot inside the Naval Academy during the last ten years.

The gentleman from Maine talks about an "emergency." He has admitted—and if he did not admit it, everybody knows the fact—that the battle ships provided for in this bill can not be constructed until two or three years after the "emergency" has entirely passed away. It has been publicly stated that the first class at the Naval Academy is to be ordered to sea if we are to have a war; and it looks to me that we shall. We are going to order these young men into the United States Navy for the purpose of engaging in war. Will any gentleman tell this committee or the House that it is not a proper thing for us to provide for them during the period of their pursuits at the Naval Academy buildings that will not subject them to dangers in some respects but little less serious than those which may confront them while engaged in the actual conflict and the real horrors of war?

A few years ago the people of this city and of this country were shocked at the tumbling down of a building in this city, occupied by officeholders, and much indignation was expressed when the suggestion was made that perhaps greater circumspection on the part of officers of the Government might have detected the insecure character of that building. Here we sit to-day talking of an "emergency," yet contentedly unregardful of greater danger to which these young men are exposed, for whose safety we are responsible. We are condemning them to pursue their studies in buildings in which they are huddled together in a manner almost suggesting the condition of the Spanish reconcentrados.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MUDD. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of occupying just a minute longer.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be recognized for one minute longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. MUDD. I have only one further remark to make, sir. If we are to get these buildings at all, we will have to do so in the general appropriation bill. I understand from some of the members of the Committee on Appropriations that they realize the necessity of providing for such buildings by special act. But members of this House—members of this body who have been longer here than I—who have seen the operation of our rules know that that is not a very easy thing to accomplish.

They know that when this committee gets through with the consideration of the general appropriation bills, its other measures will have no priority over those from other committees. No preference will be given to them, and if we get the appropriation at all for this purpose, it would not be provided in that way, because when this bill shall have passed through, the Naval Committee will be placed on an equal footing with the other committees of the House that have no special privileges and that have no unusual advantages. They will have no chance to get a report acted upon and a bill passed through the House, because then the committee—as, to a large extent, the House—will find itself under the control of the Committee on Rules.

The House knows the necessity of the action here recommended, as I have stated it. The committee knows it. It simply rests with you to say whether or not, with the buildings at the Academy crumbling down, you will rebuild to meet the urgent necessities that have arisen. There is but little need of argument upon this matter. The strongest argument that can be made, the most convincing and the most appealing argument that can be made, lies in a plain and unvarnished statement of the facts. The facts are just as I have stated them. It rests with the committee and the House to take just such action as in their judgment may seem best.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the naval appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

CONTESTED ELECTION—RYAN VS. BREWSTER.

Pending the motion to adjourn, the following business was transacted by unanimous consent:

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Elections No. 2 to submit the report of the committee in the contested-election case of William E. Ryan vs. Richard C. Brewster.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire action at this time?

Mr. MAGUIRE. No; I think it had better be printed.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed and referred to the House Calendar.

A bill (H. R. 8834) granting a pension to John B. Hays.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 4650) for the relief of John Welty, of Portsmouth, Ohio; and

A bill (H. R. 6098) to correct the military record of N. Ward Cady, late major, Second Mounted Rifles, New York Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge.

The bill (H. R. 8614) to correct the naval record of George W. Sherrard was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CARRIE F. BISSELL.

The bill (H. R. 1181) granting an increase of pension to Carrie F. Bissell, of Pueblo, Colo., was read twice by its title.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that that bill may be taken up and passed. I will state that the beneficiary is an old lady, entirely blind, and is getting now a pension of $17 a month. The House has passed the bill granting her a pension of $30. I have spoken to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and he has no objection to the bill being put on its passage.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will simply say that while this procedure is unusual, I have examined the bill and I know that the Committee on Pensions would report it back immediately. Hence I have no objection to its consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Carrie F. Bissell, widow of Harmon D. Bissell, late regimental quartermaster Eighty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. HANNAH LETCHER STEVENSON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 439) granting a pension to Mrs. Hannah Letcher Stevenson, widow of the late Brig. Gen. John B. Stevenson.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments made by the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. KYLE, Mr. VEST, and Mr. BAKER were appointed.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are other Senate bills on the table with amendments.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the pension bills which have passed both Houses but have received slight amendments in the House ought to be taken up and considered now.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I have suggested. The amendments will be concurred in without question.

CAROLINE A. SLOCUM.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2399) granting a pension to Caroline A. Slocum, which was, in line 8, after "Volunteers," to insert "and pay her a pension."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT P. WILD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 825) granting an increase of pension to Robert P. Wild.

The amendments were, in line 4, to strike out "pay" and insert "place the name of;" and in line 5, after "Infantry," to insert "on the pension rolls and pay him a pension of."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move concurrence in those amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ANNA E. BOTSFORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1181) to increase the pension of Anna E. Botsford, widow of Eli W. Botsford, late major of Sixteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The amendments were, in line 7, after "roll," to insert "and pay her a pension;" and in line 8 to strike out "amount" and insert "pension."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM L. GRIGSBY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 73) granting a pension to William L. Grigsby, of Belvidere, in the county of Thayer, Nebr.

The amendments were, in line 6, after "States," to insert "and pay him a pension;" and in line 7 to strike out all after the word "month."

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSAN A. PADDOCK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 178) granting a pension to Susan A. Paddock, which was, in line 7, after the word "her," to insert the words "a pension."

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ANN M. MADDEN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 431) granting a pension to Ann M. Madden, which was, in line 7, after "Volunteers," to insert "and pay her a pension."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

HARRIET R. MATLACK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 655) granting a pension to Harriet R. Matlack, which was, in line 8, after "Volunteers," to insert "and pay her a pension."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move concurrence in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

OLEVIA S. WASHBURN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3178) granting a pension to Olevia S. Washburn, which was, in line 7, after "Volunteers," to insert "and pay her a pension."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.
Trenton, March 17, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to respectfully call your attention to the following concurrent resolution, passed by the legislature the 17th day of March, A. D. 1898:

"Concurrent resolution.

"Whereas the legislature of New Jersey did, at its session in the year 1856, adopt a series of resolutions recognizing William A. Newell, a Representative in Congress from this State, as the originator, inventor, and founder of the United States Life-Saving Service, and extending thanks to him in the name of the State; and

"Whereas the legislature of the State of Washington, of which State William A. Newell is now a citizen, did at its last session indorse said resolution, and in addition thereto did request their Senators and Representatives in Congress to secure from the Congress of the United States, where the system was inaugurated, an indorsement of their testimonials of the States of New Jersey and of Washington, so eminently merited and so long withheld; and

"Whereas the Washington State resolutions have been thus presented and are now before committees for consideration and report: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to exert their best influence in securing national recognition of the services of William A. Newell in originating and establishing a life-saving system adopted by our Government, which during fifty years of successful operation has been instrumental in rescuing 150,000 human beings from the perils of the sea, together with many millions of dollars' worth of property for our citizens and a proportionate tariff revenue therefrom for the General Government.

"Resolved, That the Governor of this State be, and he is hereby, requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to the Representatives in Congress of the State of New Jersey."

FOSTER M. VOORHEES.

Hon. WILLIAM J. SEWELL,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SEWELL presented a memorial of the representatives of the Religious Society of Friends for New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, respecting the controversy between the United States and Spain; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the President, his Cabinet, and the Congress of the United States:

The memorial of the representatives of the Religious Society of Friends of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware respectfully represents:

That for some months past we have regarded with deep interest and solicitude the disturbed relations between our Government and that of the Kingdom of Spain in connection with the insurrection in the Island of Cuba.

We sympathize with the friendly efforts that have been used by the present as well as by the late Administration to interpose the good offices of the United States in bringing to a close the inhuman warfare between Spain and her insurgent colony, and we deplore their want of success and the continued sufferings of the Cuban people.

Whilst desiring to uphold the hands of the President in all that may conduce to the benevolent end proposed by him, we are firmly impressed with the belief that this purpose is not likely to be attained by a menace of military force on the part of the United States. Should the irritation now felt by the two nations toward each other be inflamed to the point of open warfare, while we may profess to be actuated by the humane desire to relieve the sufferings of the noncombatants in Cuba, shall we not be amenable to the charge of inconsistency by bringing on a second calamity which would add to, rather than remedy, a prior evil? The soldiers and sailors of the United States who will, in case of war, be thrust into the front rank of the battle, many of whom may lose their lives or limbs in the contest, and whose families must suffer the bereavement of husbands, fathers, and brothers, have surely no less a claim than the people of a foreign country upon the kind consideration of our rulers. Great and solemn, indeed, is the responsibility of men in power, whose action may light the flames of war and doom to death and untold misery many of their fellow-beings who have had no voice in its inception.

We hold the belief that there can be no difference between nations that can not be more advantageously adjusted to the real interests of both parties by peaceful negotiation or arbitration than by a resort to arms, that the principles of the Christian religion forbid war as emphatically as they do private combats, and that national honor can not be vindicated by mutual destruction and injury.

Should the United States and Spain be unable to adjust their present differences by the ordinary methods of peaceful diplomacy, we would urge the resort to arbitration as a course honorable in itself and in accord with the spirit which should animate a Christian nation. This method has been frequently and successfully resorted to by the United States in its intercourse with powerful governments, and would be no less just and honorable when a weaker one is involved in the controversy. In the intercourse between individuals no dispute, however serious or however it may touch an imaginary sense of honor, is regarded as beyond the ordinary peaceful process of the courts. Why, then, should the same principle be less applicable to the settlement of international differences?

We call our Union a Christian nation. The Lord Jesus Christ, whom we thus claim to follow, inculcated a loving regard on the part of His disciples toward all men, even to their enemies. An inspired apostle has declared that "the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits. * * * And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace." (James iii, 17-18.)

We would, therefore, express our earnest desire and hope that pacific counsels may still prevail with our honored President, as we have rejoiced to believe that they have in good measure done, in the management of the momentous questions now pressing upon him, and that all departments of the Government may calmly seek for divine counsel so to direct them as to be instrumental in promoting the true interests of our beloved country, and receive the blessing pronounced by the Prince of Peace upon the peacemakers.

By direction and on behalf of a meeting of the representatives aforesaid, held in Philadelphia the 25th day of the Thirdmonth, 1898.

WM. EVANS, Clerk for the Day.

Mr. THURSTON presented sundry papers in support of the bill (S. 170) granting an increase of pension to Andrew J. Cook; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4164) for the correction of the military record of James M. Crabtree, to report it without amendment and submit a report thereon.

I file with the report and the bill the affidavits of R. L. Dugan and R. A. Leonard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4165) for the correction of the military record of John R. Leonard, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CONSULAR CORRESPONDENCE ON AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, resolution No. 324.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to ask unanimous consent that that resolution may lie on the table until such time as they may desire its consideration.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. I trust the Senator from Maine will make that request subject to my right to call it up for discussion this morning.

Mr. SPOONER. I rise to inquire what the resolution is to which the Senator from Maine refers.

Mr. FRYE. It is a resolution calling for the Cuban consular correspondence.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to state that here in the rear of the Chamber we do not hear a word that is going on. We might as well be on the outside of the building.

Mr. FRYE. It is the resolution calling for the Cuban consular correspondence, and I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to ask unanimous consent that it may lie on the table until such time as they request that it may be taken up.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Nebraska desires to address the Senate with some remarks in relation to it this morning. I ask unanimous consent that that order may be made after the Senator from Nebraska has completed his remarks, as I may not be here at the completion of his address.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Maine have the question taken now?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is unanimous consent given, as requested by the Senator from Maine, that the resolution shall be taken up when requested by the Committee on Foreign Relations, subject only to the address to be made by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that that is the request of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. The request was that it might lie on the table——

Mr. HOAR. Yes; that it lie on the table.

Mr. FRYE. Until such time as the committee shall request that it may be taken up.

Mr. HOAR. Of course.

Mr. CULLOM. That is all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not object, but——

Mr. FRYE. The committee is engaged in the committee room all the time, and there are reasons why it does not wish the resolution to be taken up and passed without the presence of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make no objection to the resolution being laid on the table, but I do not think a contract should be made by Senators with the Committee on Foreign Relations that the resolution shall never be taken up except by their consent.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that after the observations of the Senator from Nebraska I may be permitted to proceed during the day with the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Maine is before the Senate. Is there any objection?

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to it in the form in which it is put.

Mr. FRYE. Then I move that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLEN. Upon that motion I desire to be heard.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Chair will consider that motion as pending.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the motion to recommit is open to debate, and that we shall hear the views of the Senator from Nebraska on the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion to recommit the resolution made by the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Nebraska is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, my zeal for Cuban independence is not new born, nor the growth of a mere night. I spoke for the liberation of the Cuban people when it was by no means a popular thing to do, and I recall very distinctly at this time that several years ago the then senior Senator from Florida [Mr. Call] and I were apparently the only persistent and outspoken friends of the Cuban people in this Chamber. We were indefatigable in our advocacy of independence and intervention. We were so persistent that we incurred the displeasure of many Senators, some of whom I am now glad to know have become the sincere and fearless advocates of independence. That I may prove the correctness of my statement, I will refer briefly to the record.

December 4, 1895, I introduced a resolution, of which this is a paragraph:

That the Government of the United States of America should promptly recognize the revolutionists of Cuba, who are now honestly struggling to secure their independence of the Spanish Government, as composing an independent nation and possessing the rights thereof according to the law of nations.

And, in speaking in its support at that time, I said, among other things:

I am of the number who believe that this Government should promptly recognize the revolutionists of Cuba and assist them in all lawful ways to secure their independence of the Spanish Government and enable them to establish an independent republic. I would not have this Government plunge headlong into a needless quarrel with the Spanish Government, but I would lend every assistance that could be lawfully and properly given to the aspirations of the people of Cuba for a republican form of government. I believe it to be the true policy and the true doctrine of our country that whenever a people show themselves desirous of establishing a republican form of government upon any territory adjacent to us they should receive our encouragement and support. If our form of government is the correct one—and of that I have no doubt—then its recognition or establishment in other lands should be encouraged, and when an opportunity shall present itself to us to lend this encouragement it should be promptly and effectually given.

Speaking to the same resolution December 11, 1895, I urged its adoption.

February 27, 1896, I said:

What is there to prohibit this Government, by proper act of Congress, whether it be in the form of a joint or concurrent resolution, from declaring the acknowledgment of the existence of the Cuban Republic; and would not that be a recognition of the independency of that republic, although as a matter of fact it may not have yet succeeded in repelling the power that assails it?

February 28 I introduced this resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to issue a proclamation recognizing the Republic of Cuba as it exists under the constitution and form of government proclaimed at Jimaguaya, under President Cisneros, in the month of May, A. D. 1895, as a free and independent nation, and according the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of said Republic all the rights and privileges accorded to the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Government of Spain.

And in its support said:

The Cubans have an established republic. It may be feeble, it is true, but certainly those people are in possession of three-fourths of that island and its life is maintained by their valor.

When we declare that the Republic of Cuba is an independent and sovereign nation, it becomes such in the meaning of international law, so far as we are concerned, although its complete independence of Spain may not have been accomplished. If the conclusion reached by the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from California is to be accepted as final, there are no circumstances under which a struggling people can be recognized as independent until, unaided and alone, they are able to maintain a government independent of those against whom they are in revolt. This is not the independent government spoken of and recognized by international law.

And again:

Mr. President, I would go further in the interest of humanity than these resolutions propose to go. I would not only recognize the belligerent rights of Cuba, but I would establish her as one of the republics of this earth. If need be, I would muster every man in the United States and every war vessel necessary to the accomplishment of the task, and I would erect on the ashes and ruins of Spain's control of that island a republic modeled after the institutions of our own. Sir, I would not only do that, but, if I had it in my power, I would admit the minister of the Republic of Cuba, feeble as it may be, unimportant in the eyes of the world as it may be, to the diplomatic circles at this capital upon terms of equality with the minister from Spain.

The same day, the Senate having under consideration a concurrent resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, declaring—

That the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

And—

That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

I offered as a substitute the resolution I have just quoted. A motion was made by Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, to lay my amendment on the table, and in support of it a yea-and-nay vote was taken, and the amendment was defeated—yeas 52, nays 17.

March 19, 1896, in discussing the constitutional power and the duty of the Government to recognize Cuban independence, I said, in reply to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]:

The Senator from Louisiana, as I said, is talking upon a very important question. Let it be conceded that authority may be found in international law applicable to the case of a kingdom or an empire, where the power of the executive is undoubted; but has the Senator any authority applicable to a Government like ours, where the governing power rests in three coordinate departments, which would lead him to believe that this high power is exclusive in the executive department?

Again, March 20, 1896, in combating the contention of the Senator from Louisiana that the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to determine a question of belligerency, I declared:

That the power to recognize the belligerency or political independence of a people is a purely political question with which the Supreme Court has no concern.

And I held, as I now hold, that it belongs to Congress, or, possibly in some instances, to Congress and the Executive together.

Yet, again, March 23, 1896, in discussing the Cuban question somewhat at length, I said:

Certainly a state of war exists on the Island of Cuba. What is war? Mr. President, it is simply an armed conflict between nations or between parts of nations. It must be something that rises above a riot; it must be a rebellion; and so far as Cuba is concerned, it is a rebellion, with a regular military organization upon the part of the insurgents. If that is not a state of war in fact, then I am entirely mistaken in my conception of what constitutes public war.

And further along:

My understanding is that about two-thirds of the Island of Cuba, possibly three-fourths, is under the dominion of the insurgents under the command of Gomez and Maceo and their followers. There is a distinct portion of that territory that has on its face as well equipped armies as could be expected under the circumstances, where the Republic of Cuba has absolute control and dominion over life and property. That is a portion of the territory through which the Spanish forces do not march and over which they do not exercise any control. There are well-equipped and drilled armies in the field under martial law. I have the number of troops here, to which I am going to refer in a moment. If that does not constitute a state of war, according to the definition of the books—if war is to be fought according to books—then I am mistaken in my understanding of what the books define to be necessary to constitute war.

And again:

Are we to stand here until the Spaniards cut the throats of the Cubans, and until the bloody events pass into the permanent history of the country, before we take any notice of what is transpiring there? We know that a state of war exists there, and the only question, in my judgment, is whether we have the patriotism to say that those people in Cuba who are struggling for their liberty shall be recognized as belligerents and have equal opportunities with the people of Spain in this country and in the ports of this country.

Still again:

If the struggling patriots of Cuba are entitled to any recognition whatever at our hands, why not give them that kind of recognition which will be of benefit to them? Why say to the people of Cuba who are waging this war for the preservation of their political rights, for the preservation of their homes, for the preservation of their wives and children, "We sympathize with you, but we can not extend to you aid under these circumstances?"

Mr. President, it occurs to me that it would be no more cruel to place water within the sight of a dying man upon a desert and to say to him, "We sympathize with you, but we can not give you the water." If we stand here and suffer Spain to apply the knife to the throats of the Cubans, we will be justly chargeable in the eyes of the civilized world with impotency and with cowardice. Why not put these resolutions in the form of a joint resolution? Why not send them to the President of the United States and say to him, "Sign these resolutions, make them a part of the law of the country, or take the responsibility of inviting the adverse criticism of your countrymen?"

A few days ago Senators in this Chamber, to use a phrase which probably is not altogether parliamentary, were falling over one another to vote for the resolution. There was a wonderful burst of patriotism and patriotic sentiment here, among Republicans and Democrats alike—and Populists were inspired a little, too—in order to demonstrate to the world by our votes that we not only sympathized with Cuba, but that we were willing, if need be, to afford her substantial aid under these distressing circumstances.

Yet our patriotism has been sifting out from that moment to this, until it is very doubtful whether the resolutions can pass here to-day. First came the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] antagonizing the resolutions, then the honorable senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and finally the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I guess, has concluded that it is about time for him to retreat, and we are offered the resolution now before the Senate to recommit the Cuban resolutions for further consideration. I suppose that is the end of it.

February 24, 1897, I introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should speedily and effectually protect the lives and liberties of peaceable American citizens residing or sojourning in Cuba, and that he should promptly insist that Spain in her war against her colonists in the Island of Cuba should conduct the same on principles of civilized warfare, eliminating all unusual and unnecessary cruelty and barbarity; and for the enforcement of these reasonable and just requirements United States battle ships should be sent without delay to Cuban waters.

And on the succeeding day, in discussing and urging its passage, remarked:

It seems to be conclusively established that the Spanish military authorities in Cuba are gathering up the little girls in that island and selling them into a species of slavery, the worst conceivable in the human mind, selling them to lives of shame. Above that and beyond that, it seems to be conclusively established that Spanish soldiers have in one or more instances taken little infants by the heels, held them up, and hacked them to pieces with the deadly machete in the presence of the mothers and the fathers, and then have destroyed the mothers and fathers themselves.

But it does seem to me absolutely humiliating that a government of 72,000,000 people, claiming to be the most powerful government upon the face of the earth, with all the means in its hands to settle this question, will sit idly and supinely here and make no effort to protect these people, these innocent little girls and children, who are being treated with this extreme barbarity from day to day. Here is this decaying monarchy of Spain, a blot upon the map of the world, a disgrace, Mr. President, to the present civilization of Europe, a disgrace to the civilization of the Western Hemisphere; and here is Congress, with this conduct going on almost within 100 miles of our shores, and not a substantial effort is put forth to check it. Mr. President, the time will come, and come speedily, unless we take prompt action in this matter, when a man will have to hang his head in shame for being an American citizen.

Again, February 25, 1897, I said:

For the purpose of testing the question whether we shall have war or peace and whether there is any sincerity in these resolutions, I move that the Indian appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside and that the joint resolution with reference to Julio Sanguily be taken up for consideration.

May 11, 1897, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] having introduced a resolution declaring that a condition of public war existed in Cuba and that neutrality should be maintained, I observed:

The world knows that Spain has been guilty of atrocities that no civilized nation can sustain either directly or indirectly. The cruelties have been without a precedent in the last one hundred years of the world's existence. This Government has sent special agent after special agent to Cuba to ascertain the truth, and yet when we want information from the State Department we have to seek it as supplicants, not as Senators charged with a public duty and capable of discharging that duty. We have to appeal to the State Department or to the executive branch of the Government for information. Repeatedly the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has told us what the facts are, and he is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations; and yet constantly we have this delay.

* * * * * * *

Is it possible that the United States by this indirection is willing to commit itself to the Spanish policy of atrocity and cruelty?

Is it possible that the President of the United States, or those who may represent him in this Chamber, are willing that these cruelties shall go on and that the Senate shall not voice its conviction of Spanish cruelty in Cuba? If that is the policy, Mr. President, I feel confident that the people of the United States will condemn it. If that is the policy, it is a cowardly policy for any Administration to adopt. The joint resolution ought to be adopted unanimously, without a dissenting voice.

December 8, 1897, I introduced this resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that Congress should, with all due and convenient speed, acknowledge by appropriate act the political independence of the Republic of Cuba—

And, in support of it, said:

Notwithstanding the President has urged the contrary in his message, I would not be content or satisfied with a simple acknowledgment of the belligerent rights of the people of that island, but I would demand absolute and unconditional political liberty and a recognition of the government they themselves have formed and to whose sovereignty they owe allegiance.

The American people believe in political and religious liberty, and they are anxious to accord to others what they themselves esteem the birthright of all, and I am confident they will not be content with the course advised by this, as they were not with that pursued by the preceding, Administration in withholding from Cuba that priceless blessing.

And further along:

We have declared our unchangeable devotion to the doctrine that this continent shall be free soil and be trodden alone by freemen, and yet we sustain the hold of a tottering and cruel monarchy, the institutions of which are passing into decay and which is satisfied only when inflicting on a civilized people, struggling for their political independence, the most cruel torture. In His own good time, God will call us to account for such rank hypocrisy and such a flagrant neglect of public duty.

February 8, 1898, in speaking on the subject of Cuba, I remarked:

My attention has been called to the fact that since the opening of hostilities between the Republic of Cuba and the Spanish forces in that island 200,000 pacificos have died by starvation and disease generated and directly traceable to the lack of sufficient food and sanitary conditions. I had a conversation a few days ago with a gentleman who is very familiar with the island and the conditions existing there, whose word can not be doubted and whose position warrants him in speaking with authority, in which he informed me that it was the custom of the Spanish Government to herd hundreds of families together in sheds and exposed positions, without any sanitary conditions whatever, starving them until disease as a result of their starvation intervenes, and that over 300,000 of them had died in consequence of that treatment.

Mr. President, I have quoted freely from my resolutions and remarks, not to exalt myself in the eyes of anyone, but to show that in the years that have gone by I have steadfastly advocated the political independence embraced in the present discussion. I have never wavered in the belief nor lost faith in the fact that ultimately Cuba, by force of the public sentiment of this country and of the civilized world and by the gallantry of her soldiers, would win her freedom and add her name to the republics of this continent. I have at all times been convinced that sooner or later she would stand forth, perhaps weak at first but ultimately strong, a splendid young republic added to the grand galaxy of republics of the earth. In the hour of her deepest political night, when there did not seem a ray of hope or a gleam of light, I felt confident that in the providence of God she would wrest her liberty from Spain and proudly take her station in the ranks of self-governed peoples.

Mr. President, nations, like men, that would accomplish great results must not grow weary; they must not hesitate; they must not turn back; they must not grow faint-hearted, but persistently push on, determined to accomplish their high purpose, and bide the time when an awakened sense of right in the enlightened world will aid them.

During the years of Cuba's gallant struggle for liberty—now happily, in my judgment, almost at an end—there were those who said our Government ought to tender its good offices for autonomy under the Spanish flag, while others favored merely the recognition of belligerency; but Cuba's true friends, penetrating the cloud of darkness, foresaw the outcome of the unhappy and unfortunate condition then prevailing.

Sir, we stand to Cuba as an elder brother. We owe her a duty we can not honorably escape. To desert her at this time would be base cowardice—a cowardice the people of the United States and the men of other generations would not palliate or excuse. We are the guardians of liberty on this continent. We must do our duty without temporizing or hesitancy, not in a swaggering manner like the bravado or the bully; not in a way that will indicate we are moved by prejudice or by passion, but in a manner that will convince the world that we believe the time has come at last when every foot of American soil occupied by the hideous monarchy of Spain should be wrested from her and be henceforth dedicated to the cause of human freedom.

I will not weary the Senate with lengthy remarks. I shall not take time to define my position, for I have defined it an infinite number of times before. I stand now where I stood at the first moment the war began—in favor of prompt, unconditional recognition of the political independence of the Republic of Cuba.

Our ancestors declared to the world that all men are by nature free and equal and entitled to certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They did not confine themselves to the inhabitants of the colonies; they did not limit the declaration to the people of the Western Hemisphere; but they held that all men, under whatever sun they might be born or on whatever soil they might live, were created free and equal and entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Sir, I hold human freedom and the right of self-government to be as inalienable as the right to breathe the air or to enjoy the sunlight, or any of the manifold gifts of God to his people. My right to govern myself, if capable of doing so; to believe and act as I will, not interfering with the like right of others, and to worship the Supreme Being in my own way is as inseparable from my existence as life itself. The right of self-government is God-given and inalienable, and whoever violates it flies in the face of Providence and wrests from the individual the most precious gift of all.

Mr. President, for forty years the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness, fleeing from Pharaoh and his host of persecutors and taskmasters. For forty years they sought religious and political freedom in desert wastes. They fled from the land of oppression and bondage to the land of promise that flowed with milk and honey. Their great leader, in the nobleness of his nature, could not endure to see his people in slavery, compelled to make brick without straw for the Egyptians under the lash of their cruel masters. To him was revealed the duty of leading his brethren and the hosts of Israel to the promised land. They started on a journey made memorable by Biblical record—a journey unparalleled in the history of the world.

They had no food for their sustenance, but He who sees even the sparrow's fall fed them with manna and quail from on high. Their raiment was inadequate, but He who clothes the lily of the field wonderfully preserved their garments. Their cause was right. They trusted to God, who guides the destiny of nations and of individuals, and were delivered from the land of captivity and bondage and founded a mighty nation, whose people have increased and spread throughout the earth.

Mr. President, there is a striking similitude found in the condition of the Cubans. Twice forty years they have struggled for liberty and for freedom from Spanish masters. War has been repeatedly waged, thousands of human lives have been lost. While the struggle was an unequal one, resulting in disaster to their cause, they have been inspired by an unquenchable thirst for freedom by the example we furnished them, and they have persevered until now they stand within the dawn of absolute independence under the guidance of the master hand of Maximo Gomez. Gomez will occupy a bright page in the history of his country, now being rapidly written by current events, while Weyler's page will be made infamous by murder and assassination.

Gomez, advanced in years, frail of body, but stout of heart and resolute of purpose, can justly be ranked among the great commanders and revolutionists of the century. Almost any other man at his time of life would have sought repose rather than war, but he chose the field of glory whereon liberty is to be won or lost forever for his countrymen. He spurned bribes and offers of position at the hands of a cowardly Spanish dynasty. He is the firm and steadfast friend of his people, and has smitten the rock that will cause political freedom to gush forth and save a famishing nation.

Gomez, like his illustrious prototype, may not live to see the complete deliverance of his people from the bondage of Spain. He may be permitted to view the promised land from some mountain height and then be lost to the world forever and no man know the place of his burial, but the memory of his deeds will live fresh in the minds of the people as long as liberty has an abiding place on earth.

The life of Spain, extending over two thousand years, is written in innocent blood and is black with crime. Who can turn to the history of Cortez's conquest of Mexico from 1518 to 1521 and read of the hundreds of thousands of inoffensive men and women who were slain without turning from the appalling account sick at heart; or to Pizarro's expedition to Peru, where thousands of innocent lives were sacrificed and the Inca foully murdered after having paid over 4,600,000 ducats as the price of peace for his country; or to the account of the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands, whose crimes are so vividly portrayed by the historian Motley, without being absolutely appalled.

This savage monster first established what is known in history as the Blood Council. He destroyed all domestic judicial tribunals, and before himself and his Blood Council the innocent peasantry were brought for trial; but they were not tried. Without evidence and without hearing they were indiscriminately sent to the stake, to the rope, or to the funeral pile. The sickening account of blood and death is thus related:

> Thus the whole country became a charnel house; the death bell tolled hourly in every village; not a family but was called to mourn for its dearest relatives, while the survivors stalked listlessly about, the ghosts of their former selves, among the wrecks of their former homes. The spirit of the nation, within a few months after the arrival of Alva, seemed hopelessly broken. * * * The blood of its best and bravest had already stained the scaffold; men to whom it had been accustomed to look for guidance and protection were dead, in prison, or in exile. Submission had ceased to be of any avail, flight was impossible, and the spirit of vengeance had lighted at every fireside. The mourners went daily about the streets, for there was hardly a house which had not been made desolate.
> The scaffolds, the gallows, the funeral piles which had been sufficient in ordinary times, furnished now an entirely inadequate machinery for the incessant executions. Columns and stakes in every street, the doorposts of private houses, the fences in the fields, were laden with human carcasses, strangled, burned, beheaded. The orchards in the country bore on many a tree the hideous fruit of human bodies. Thus the Netherlands were crushed, and, but for the stringency of the tyranny which had now closed their gates, would have been depopulated.

Mr. President, this is a most striking and vivid parallel of the career of Weyler. That monster went to Cuba with the deliberate and premeditated purpose of depopulating it by every known process of extermination. The midnight darkness was made lurid by the torch applied to the habitations of a peaceful peasantry and the inhabitants were shot down or hacked to death by the machete in the light of the consuming flames. Those who were not engaged in the war and gave it no aid or sympathy, old men, innocent women, and sucklings, were destroyed indiscriminately.

Women were violated in the most shocking manner and destroyed, while orphaned children, as they wandered aimlessly about, were killed by an idle and reckless soldiery whose occupation is murder and whose pastime is pillage. The prison was the tomb from which none were permitted to escape alive. There was universal destruction, devastation, mourning, and ashes. Finally, being convinced that death was not speedy enough for his purpose, Weyler issued an order that all the pacificos should be concentrated at stated places, huddled together like animals, not furnished with food nor permitted to seek it for themselves, and, having no sanitary conveniences, they became the victims of certain starvation until the record of mortality, as we are informed, has reached 500,000 souls.

We have heard from the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], from the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], from my colleague [Mr. THURSTON], and from the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] vivid relations of the sad story of death and devastation. In all history a more hideous and cruel character than Weyler can not be found. Cortez, Pizarro, the Duke of Alva, and Weyler will stand forth in all ages as typical Spanish soldiers, and Weyler will be regarded as the most inhuman of all. They are the butchers of the past and present age. The sea-green Robespierre in the palmiest days of the French Revolution, when heads were falling daily by the hundreds, was not more malicious or more fiendish than Weyler in Cuba, but 90 miles from our shores.

Is it to be supposed that the American people, the Christian conscience of the world, will longer submit to this wholesale murder and assassination? Weyler's rule was absolutism, tempered alone by murder and modified by assassination. The aim was total extermination of the inhabitants of the island and a repeopling of that blood-soaked land by willing slaves from Spain and other servile countries.

Mr. President, I pass for a moment only to the sinking of the battle ship Maine. According to the recent custom of nations an armed vessel is permitted to enter the port of a friendly power and anchor at such place as may be designated by competent authority. The anchorage may be changed at the instance of the nation owning the port. It is an act of courtesy recognized by civilized governments. It can not be doubted that when an armed vessel of one nation enters the port of another and casts anchor in her waters at a place designated by her authorities there is at least an implied guaranty that the place of anchorage is reasonably safe and that no mine or outside explosive is concealed beneath the waves to send her to the bottom and the souls of her inmates to eternity.

I am not disposed to discuss the painful circumstances of the destruction of the Maine and the loss of life incident thereto. It is humiliating, it is mortifying, to say nothing of the inhumanity attending the act. I fully concur in the opinion that Spain must be made to atone for this wholesale murder, not by the payment of money, for she does not possess gold enough to compensate the insult offered this nation, or for one precious human life lost in the disaster of February 15. But she must compensate by freeing Cuba, by furling her dirty flag and leaving the Western Hemisphere never to return again; never, at least, while the Government of the United States exists and exercises a controlling influence in the politics of this continent.

Mr. President, I am the jingo of jingoes. From the time the war broke out between Spain and Cuba I have been the steadfast and uncompromising advocate of independence. I have never doubted that it would be won, although at times it looked dark; but that ultimately the Cubans would be able to wrest their freedom from the Spanish throne I have always thought certain, and they stand to-day in hailing distance of a new and more perfect civilization. Whatever adjustment is made of the Maine disaster, one thing must be definitely understood—it must not be submitted to the arbitrament of foreign powers. Spain must reckon with the American people alone.

Mr. President, possibly I would have exhibited better taste by closing my remarks in simply calling attention to the resolutions I have offered and the speeches I have made on the subject of recognizing Cuban independence, but I have thought it not out of place to take a brief general view of the Cuban situation.

I rejoice to know that the American people have become aroused to the extent that they will no longer listen to Spanish lying or give ear to Spanish threats. We are not a nation of braggarts; we do not seek war with Spain or with any other country. We will resort to arms only when our cause is just and when the enlightened judgment of the American people and of the world will approve our conduct. But, sir, because we are peace loving it must not be thought we are unmindful of the duties imposed on us or that our people are lacking in spirit. We at all times seek peace rather than war, but not that kind of peace that is to be purchased at any price, nor peace with Cuba in chains. In the language of the English ballad—

> We don't want to fight, but, by jingo, if we do,
> We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money, too.

If Spain will hunt down and execute the deadly assassin who, under cover of darkness, sunk the battle ship Maine and sent, without warning, 266 souls into the presence of their Maker; if she will relinquish her occupancy of Cuba, take down her flag from this continent—a flag whose only claim to public attention is that it is stained with twenty centuries of innocent blood, cruelty, and crime—and leave American soil forever, we will be content. We have no greed for Spanish territory nor for Spanish gold. Our policy is that of a contented, domestic people. We do not want Cuba. We do not even desire to be her guardian. But we are determined she shall be free and that for all time we will be rid of the close proximity of a nation whose chief occupation is the shedding of innocent blood.

The torch that has lighted Cuba so long must be extinguished, the shrieks of dying women and children must be hushed, broken hearts must be bound up, wounds be healed, the prison pens be opened, and the people made free. Cuba, now draped in mourning, must once more become the gem of the Caribbean Sea, and when all these shall have been accomplished, speedily, let us hope, the American people can well afford to announce to the world that their account with the Spanish Kingdom is forever closed.

Sir, if I could have my own way, I would promptly recall our minister from Madrid and give Spain's minister at Washington his passport. I would close forever the political, financial, and commercial relations of the two nations, and not again permit an armed Spaniard to set foot on American soil.

Mr. President, it is well known that I am thoroughly and unalterably opposed to the President in most of his policies. It would be impossible for us to be brought together unless he should cease to be a Republican and become a Populist, a thing he probably will not do. I have no faith that our country can ever become permanently prosperous by an application of the domestic policies he would enforce.

But in this time of great national anxiety, when there is an impending cloud of war, as one of the Senators of one of the greatest and best States of the Union, I am willing to give him my support and encouragement and aid him in the solution of this troublesome question. In the presence of the grave circumstances now confronting the American people all mere party differences must for the time be laid aside, and all American citizens, regardless of political affiliation, stand together for the honor and glory of their country.

Sir, in all I have said in behalf of Cuban independence in the years gone by, from the time the subject first came to the notice of Congress to this moment, my conscience has been my sole guide. It has been—

> A lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path.

I have said for the Cubans what I would say for any other nation under like circumstances, and what I would want them to say for my country if positions were changed.

Mr. President, I believe Cuba is free. I believe but a few more days and we will witness the flag of the new Republic, consecrated by thousands of human lives, by so much blood, by the tears and groans of her people, the wailing of her womanhood and the sacrifice of her childhood, waving in triumph from Pinar del Rio to Santiago de Cuba. Then we will be able to exclaim, as did one of old:

> The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the resolution now before the Senate was reported yesterday by the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] from the Committee on Foreign Relations. It requests the President—

> If not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate all of the consular correspondence relating to the conduct of the war in the Island of Cuba, the condition of the people, and other matters relating thereto.

The Senator from Maine twice stated in connection with the resolution yesterday that he should to-day ask for its consideration. The Senator now asks that the resolution may lie on the table, not to be called up without the consent of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that request being objected to, he asks that it may be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

This action indicates doubt and indecision on the part of the Committee on Foreign Relations, perhaps proper under existing circumstances. Yesterday they thought there ought to be a new call made upon the President of the United States for information as to the condition of the Cuban population. To-day they think the call ought to be delayed.

Mr. President, the first call made upon the President for information as to the condition of the suffering Cubans brought about by the Cuban war was adopted by the Senate on motion of the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on the 14th day of February. The first clause of the resolution then agreed to unanimously by the Senate requested the President—

> If in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public service, to send to the Senate copies of the reports of the consul-general and of the consuls of the United States in Cuba written or received since March 4, 1897, which relate to the state of the war in that island and the condition of the people there, or that he will send such parts of said reports as will inform the Senate as to these facts.

On the same day, the 14th of February, a resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, calling for the same information on that day asked for by the Senate. The House request was stated in detail and asked for full information on all points in relation to the condition of the Cubans in the Island of Cuba in connection with the pending war.

Mr. President, on the next day, February 15, at 9.40 o'clock in the evening, an answer to those resolutions came from Spain, but to this hour no answer has been received from the President of the United States. I am not unaware that there may be reasons why this information should be withheld. I am bound to presume that there are such reasons from the fact that from the 14th day of February until this moment we have had from the Executive no statement of the knowledge possessed by him as to the condition of the people of Cuba derived from the reports of Consul-General Lee and the other consuls on the island.

But the Senate and the country are not without some information as to the condition of the Cuban people. Such information was needed by the Senate and the country in order to determine what action, if any, should be taken by the United States in connection with the war in Cuba, and it has been furnished to us by four members of this body who have seen with their own eyes, who have heard with their own ears, and who have testified to us what they know on this subject; and whatever criticisms may be made concerning the visit of any of those Senators to the Island of Cuba, I take occasion to say that the four Senators have rendered the greatest possible service they could render at this time to their own country, to the world, and to suffering humanity.

Mr. President, if there is any reason why the country should not know whether or not the official reports of Consul-General Lee and the United States consuls in Cuba confirm or refute the stories which have been told to us by our associates, I should be glad to be so informed. I do not myself believe there is a sufficient reason for withholding the reports of the consuls. I am impressed with the idea that the reports might have been sent in immediately after the calls were made upon the 14th of February, and I certainly think that upon the 16th day of February, after the news had come to the people of the United States of the destruction of the Maine, the Congress and the people of the United States ought to have been told what the testimony was on file in the State Department concerning the condition of the oppressed Cuban population.

But, Mr. President, I am not disposed to enlarge upon this subject. I have the fullest confidence in the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have confidence that the President of the United States intends to pursue a patriotic and righteous course in the pending crisis; and I shall thank God when he announces his conclusion concerning the present emergency. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. CHANDLER. Therefore I am not in rebellion as yet against the powers that be. I wait upon the President of the United States; I wait upon the Committee on Foreign Relations; but I do feel that as that committee yesterday deemed it advisable that this second call should be made upon the President for information and now have reached the conclusion that the second call should not be made, the Senator from Maine ought to give us some reason for their delay.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the confidence which the Senator from New Hampshire expresses in the Committee on Foreign Relations renders any reply to his remarks unnecessary. The committee are acting advisedly in asking that this resolution may, for the present, lie over.

Mr. GRAY. We will try to be worthy of that confidence.

Mr. FRYE. And, as the Senator from Delaware says, we will try to entitle ourselves to the confidence which the Senator from New Hampshire reposes in us.

Mr. CHANDLER. Individually the two Senators before me have always had my confidence. Collectively, sometimes I think they are wrong and make mistakes.

Mr. FRYE. The committee has been made aware of that fact on several occasions.

Mr. CHANDLER. Undoubtedly. I shall always commend the two Senators when they are doing right and admonish them when I think they are doing wrong. I wish to be informed what is the present request of the Senator from Maine concerning his resolution.

Mr. FRYE. I made a motion to recommit.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall not object to the control by the committee of their own resolution. They may start and back and start and back and start again, and I will help them whenever I can. I do not object if I may be allowed to offer a resolution myself and have it go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present a resolution which I ask may be read and lie over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if it is not incompatible with the public service, to send to the Senate the copies of the reports of the consul-general and of the consuls of the United States in Cuba referred to in the resolution of the Senate adopted on February 14, 1898.

Mr. FRYE. I give notice to the Senator from New Hampshire that to-morrow when the resolution is called up, I shall move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Maine for the information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 8438) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall not object to the request of the Senator from Iowa, knowing that if he chose to move to take up the bill, it would undoubtedly be carried in the Senate; but I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the quarantine bill—a very important measure—is before the Senate, and I suggested yesterday that I desired to address the Senate on it to-day. I am quite content to have it go over for a few days, if necessary, or for a day or two, until the appropriation bill is out of the way; but I wish to say in the absence of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who has charge of the so-called quarantine bill, that the other members of the committee are very anxious to have it pressed to a vote, so that the country may know whether or not we are to have legislation on this important measure.

Mr. ALLISON. I was not aware of the notice given by the Senator from New Hampshire. I take it for granted he will yield for an appropriation bill at any time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore I hope there will be no objection to taking up the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 199) to postpone the opening of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It was up yesterday and was objected to. I understand there will be no objection to it at the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] to the request.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Has the joint resolution been modified to meet the views of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]?

Mr. NELSON. I have withdrawn objection to the consideration of the joint resolution, but in my opinion the changes which I suggested to the Senator from Arkansas ought to be made. They are not consented to, however. I think the effect of the Senate amendment will be to open all gilsonite lands outside of those surveyed to anybody who sees fit to take them; and that will be contrary to the spirit of the law. I think the words "known to contain" ought not to be in the Senate amendment, but I shall not take the responsibility of objecting to the measure, inasmuch as it is claimed to be important that it should pass. But in my opinion those words in the joint resolution will lead to this condition, that all gilsonite lands outside of the little which has been surveyed will be secured, and it will ultimately lead to a scandal.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the term "known to contain" ought to be stricken out. I do not believe it is proper and right. Before objecting, I ask the attention of the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from Utah, who I understand are taking some interest in the matter, to this expression:

That all lands within said reservation other than agricultural land and lands known to contain asphaltum.

There is no reason why lands containing asphaltum, whether it is known at the present time or not, should not be excepted from the operation of the measure. Any lands containing asphaltum ought to be excepted from the bill, and it ought to be made clear. I suggest to the Senators that the words "known to contain" ought to be stricken out; so as to read:

That all lands within said reservation other than agricultural land and lands containing asphaltum, etc.

I suggest the omission of those words and changing the word "contain" to "containing."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that the amendment is not mine. However, I believe that in the form in which I have presented the joint resolution it is entirely proper and that it protects the interests of the people of the United States. A large body of land containing gilsonite was discovered within this reservation. We sent the Geological Survey there, which investigated it and mapped it. It is supposed they have found and mapped all there is. Now, I can see no reason why, when we have reserved that which is already known, the other portion of this reservation shall not be opened to American enterprise.

The joint resolution opens it to the explorer to find a gold mine, and if he finds it his title is secure under the laws of the United States. If he finds gilsonite or elaterite or kindred substances through his energy and enterprise, why should that land be reserved, when a gold mine, if he should find one, even if it contained untold millions, would be accorded to him at once? It is a reward for enterprise and discovery that induces the miner to go into that region, and if he finds beds of gilsonite not now discovered there is no reason under heaven why he should not have the same right to enter those under the mineral laws as to enter gold mines.

However, so far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, but the Senators from Utah object, and if we are to get this measure through, it must be by unanimous consent; for by to-morrow this country will be open to settlement, agricultural and mineral lands as well.

Mr. NELSON. The gilsonite lands will not be open to settlement.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the proposed amendment to the joint resolution as it passed the House was so framed as to be satisfactory to the representatives of the views entertained by some Senators, and it seems to me there is no reasonable objection to the words which are sought to be stricken out.

Mr. President, as already stated by the Senator from South Dakota, these lands in the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation have been subjected to a careful examination under the Geological Bureau, and all the lands supposed to contain asphaltum or gilsonite have been investigated, and a report as to those lands has been made by the Department. If there are any lands containing asphaltum outside of the pieces thus designated and described, they are unknown. It is the purpose of the joint resolution to throw open to entry on and after the 1st of April of this year all lands within that reservation excepting agricultural lands, and it is the design to give six months additional time to the Department to allot those lands to the Indians and to except lands known to contain asphaltum and gilsonite.

I am unwilling that the word "known" shall be stricken from the joint resolution for this reason: That is a desolate country. The poor prospector will go out when these lands are thrown open to prospect and enter under the mineral-land laws of the United States, and he may locate his mining claim 1,500 feet long and 600 feet wide; he may spend one, two, three years, or any other number of years and all the money he has in the development of his claim; and if in the course of that development work he should strike a vein of elaterite or gilsonite or asphaltum, I think he is entitled to it.

It is the rule which now prevails. For instance, if a man enters agricultural land and obtains title to it, mineral being unknown to exist in the land, and he should subsequently discover any valuable mineral upon the land, he is entitled to it. If a man locates a mining claim for lead, supposing it to contain lead, and it subsequently develops that it contains some other valuable mineral, he is entitled to it. I am unwilling to cloud the title of every man who goes into that desolate country and endures the hardships which he necessarily is compelled to endure in locating and developing a claim, as we would do, because, if the contention of the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Arkansas is correct, if he should locate land and subsequently obtain title to it and thereafter it should be discovered that there was some asphaltum or gilsonite or elaterite on the land, his title would be destroyed.

Again, there is no reason why this word should be stricken out, because the sole object of the reservation of these asphaltum lands from entry under the mineral-land laws, as I understand it, is that this mineral is known and located, and a man going in there and locating it would not have to run any risks in respect to its discovery. Therefore it is sought to reserve these lands in order to dispose of them by some other method. If the Senator from Arkansas is unwilling to let this measure pass as it is proposed, I shall be compelled to object to its consideration.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I believe it is very important that the time for opening this land shall be extended, and I am very anxious to comply with the request of the Interior Department to do it, but if the Senator from Utah is inclined to say that that can only be done on the condition that he shall be allowed to change the laws now applying to gilsonite lands, I say at once it can not be done.

Mr. STEWART. What is the amendment pending?

Mr. RAWLINS. The question is as to the consideration of the joint resolution, and I object.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was a request for unanimous consent, which has not been granted. The discussion has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent has not been given. The amendment was proposed without unanimous consent having been formally given.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say to the Senator from Arkansas that he is absolutely correct; that if the amendment is adopted it will change the existing law in respect to the disposal of gilsonite lands.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There can be no question about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am perfectly willing to allow the joint resolution to pass as it comes from the House. I have no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah if he will allow the land laws as applied to gilsonite lands to remain as they are; but if the measure as it comes from the other House can not be allowed to pass without a material change in the law in regard to gilsonite lands, I shall object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 179) granting a pension to Mary F. Hawley;

An act (S. 294) granting increase of pension to John J. Boatwright;

An act (S. 1111) granting an increase of pension to Joseph V. Bowie;

An act (S. 1200) granting a pension to Miss Mary Hayne;

An act (S. 1465) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Phillips;

An act (S. 3179) granting a pension to Bethiah H. Rollins; and

An act (S. 3873) to authorize the relocation and rebuilding of a pontoon bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, Wis.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4936) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the sundry civil appropriation bill be now proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8428) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that in the consideration of the bill the formal reading be dispensed with and that the bill be read for action upon the amendments, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

Mr. NELSON. I want to reserve all points of order in connection with the bill. By waiving the formal reading I do not want to waive any point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that he will have an opportunity to make any points upon any items in the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Very well. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). If there be no objection, the course suggested by the Senator from Iowa will be pursued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Under the Treasury Department," on page 2, after line 9, to insert:

For completion of construction of a one-story annex building to the temporary post-office building at Chicago, Ill., $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 21, to insert:

Old post-office building, Detroit, Mich.: That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to disregard sections 2 and 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Detroit, Mich.," approved March 2, 1895, authorizing the sale of the old post-office building located in the city of Detroit, Mich., and is hereby authorized to transfer from the appropriations heretofore made for the construction of a new public building in said city such sum as may be necessary to remodel said old post-office building and put the same in suitable repair for the use and accommodation of the Government departments at said city of Detroit, Mich.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. At the request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, I ask that the amendments relating to immigrant buildings at Ellis Island may be passed over for the present, so that lines 10 to 19, inclusive, shall be open—all that deals with the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments indicated by the Senator from Iowa will be passed over for the present, if there be no objection.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, after line 19, to insert:

For post-office and custom-house at Jacksonville, Fla.: For outbuilding for toilet-room purposes, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 9, to insert:

For mint building at San Francisco, Cal.: For necessary repairs, $45,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 12, to insert:

For post-office at Annapolis, Md.: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to select, designate, and procure, by purchase or otherwise, a suitable site, and to commence the construction of a fireproof post-office building thereon, in the city of Annapolis, Md., said site to contain at least 16,000 square feet of ground, and to leave an open space around the building to be erected thereon, including streets and alleys, of 40 feet, $120,000.

The amendment was agreed to,

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 21, to insert:

Purchase of old Globe Building: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase the following real estate in the city of Washington, D. C., with the improvements thereon, known and designated as original lots No. 14 and 15, and part of original lot No. 16, in reservation No. 10, beginning, for said part of lot 16, 70 feet 2 inches northwardly from Pennsylvania avenue and running back with the full width of the lot to the public alley in the rear thereof, and containing 11,146 square feet, being the property of Edward H. Thomas, trustee, $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, against that amendment I make the point of order that it is not a proper amendment under the first subdivision and the third subdivision of Rule XVI. It is entirely a new appropriation, and is not in pursuance of any existing law. The amendment provides for the purchase of an old, dilapidated building along the Avenue that was on the market when I came to Washington first, in 1883. I noticed in the newspapers a short time ago that a real estate man by the name of Warner has now got control of the property. I see the amendment says it belongs to Thomas, trustee. Why the Government should buy that old, dilapidated building at $45,000 I do not know. I make the point of order that the amendment is contrary to the provisions of Rule XVI of the Senate rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota makes a point of order against the amendment under Rule XVI.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to state that it does not seem pertinent for any point of order to lie against any action which the Senate and the House may desire for their own convenience and for the management of their own business. The amendment provides for the purchase of the building for the benefit of the Senate and the House, and it is certainly no ordinary legislation, such as is contemplated by the rule.

Mr. NELSON. Nothing of the kind appears on the face of the amendment, and that can be urged in reference to any item of appropriation. It is an entirely new appropriation; it is not in pursuance of any existing law, and I am surprised to find it in this appropriation bill. When we who are not fortunate enough to be on the Appropriations Committee have any matters to bring before that committee, when we desire to have any appropriations put on, we are met with a most solemn countenance and told, "You can not put this on; it is contrary to the rules; it is new legislation; it is an increase of the appropriation."

I think when the members of the Appropriations Committee apply these rigid rules to us, they ought at least to apply the same rules to themselves. Here is an old piece of dilapidated property that has been on the market here for a generation, down on the Avenue, and now it is proposed in these times, when the Government is economizing in all directions and getting ready for war, you might say, to buy the old lumbering building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will direct the Secretary to read for the information of the Senate the clauses of the rule bearing on the point of order raised by the Senator from Minnesota.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XVI.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order made——

Mr. COCKRELL. One moment, Mr. President. Let me state the case. This amendment was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and favorably reported by that committee. It is clearly within the purview of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to so state. The present occupant of the chair, occupying it by courtesy, thinks the question should be delegated to the Senate to pass upon. Therefore those who are in favor of sustaining the point of order made by the Senator from Minnesota will please signify the same by saying "aye;" contrary minded, "no." [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. NELSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEWART. Before the vote is taken, I should like to inquire whether the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was recommended by any committee or how it got on the bill. What is its status? Was it recommended by a standing or a select committee?

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment was introduced by some Senator—I do not remember who introduced it—and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That committee reported favorably upon it and it was sent to the Committee on Appropriations under the rule. The Committee on Appropriations made an investigation, such an investigation as they could, respecting it, and thought it would be a wise thing to purchase the building, to be used by the two Houses for storage purposes in lieu of rented buildings now occupied by the two Houses costing $3,600 per annum. I have no care about the amendment, but I do not think that it is in any sense liable to a point of order. If we can not rent a building or buy one for our own immediate purposes, I do not see how we can get on. The Committee on Appropriations, as far as I know, have no special desire about the amendment one way or the other.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to have the Senator from Minnesota restate his point of order.

Mr. NELSON. I will state my point of order succinctly. This is a new item of appropriation put in the bill, and it is not in pursuance of any existing law or treaty stipulation.

No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or treaty stipulation.

Now, this is a new item of appropriation, and it is not made——

Mr. SPOONER. I had always supposed that rule applied to amendments offered on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. It applies to all amendments.

Mr. SPOONER. I supposed it applied to amendments offered after the bill was reported.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Minnesota did not read all of the rule. The rule says:

Or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. That is another requisite. Those are both conditions. First, it must be recommended by a committee; and then it must be in pursuance of existing law. We are always met with that by the Appropriations Committee when we seek to get appropriations made; that the amendment is not in pursuance of existing law. We frequently get amendments recommended by other committees. In my experience I have had amendments referred to that committee recommended by other committees, and yet I have been politely told (and I do not find any fault with it) that it is not in pursuance of existing law; that it is new legislation.

A rule that is applied with such rigidity to us, the Committee on Appropriations ought to apply to themselves. The only excuse is that they want the old Globe Building, that has been an eyesore here on Pennsylvania avenue for years, as a sort of lumbering storeroom, and especially now, when we are getting the new Post-Office building ready and will have ample room. The idea of buying an old closet to store the odds and ends of creation on Pennsylvania avenue at this time for $45,000 seems to me supremely out of place. For that reason I object to the amendment both on its merits and as being, under the rules of the Senate, subject to a point of order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. This is an important matter, Mr. President. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called by the Secretary.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Faulkner,	Mallory,	Shoup,
Allen,	Gallinger,	Martin,	Smith,
Allison,	Gear,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Bacon,	Gorman,	Money,	Stewart,
Bate,	Hale,	Morrill,	Teller,
Berry,	Hanna,	Murphy,	Thurston,
Butler,	Hansbrough,	Nelson,	Tillman,
Cannon,	Harris,	Pasco,	Turley,
Carter,	Hawley,	Penrose,	Turner,
Chandler,	Hoar,	Perkins,	Walthall,
Chilton,	Jones, Ark.	Pettus,	Wetmore,
Clay,	Jones, Nev.	Platt, Conn.	Wilson,
Cockrell,	Lodge,	Platt, N. Y.	Wolcott.
Deboe,	McBride,	Pritchard,
Elkins,	McEnery,	Rawlins,
Fairbanks,	McMillan,	Sewell,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the point of order made by the Senator from Minnesota, it seems to me, is clearly untenable. While I sympathize in a general way with the object of the Senator, yet it will be impossible to reach the item except by a vote. The rule referred to provides that—

All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation—

That is this case—

unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or—

Not "and" but "or"—

or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

Now, if either of those alternatives be met, the item of appropriation is in order in the shape of an amendment to a general appropriation bill. A distinction must be drawn between new items of appropriation and items of general legislation which would be governed by the third clause of this rule. If it were general legislation proposed in the shape of an amendment to an appropriation bill, then the fact that it was reported by some standing or select committee of the Senate would not relieve it from the point of order. A distinction must also be drawn between a new item of appropriation such as this and an item of appropriation in payment of a private claim.

If this were an amendment to pay a private claim, then it would fall under section 4 of the rule and would be subject to the point of order, unless it was to carry out the provision of an existing law or a treaty stipulation. But, sir, being a new item of appropriation it is clearly in order if either state of case which I have described be met; that is, it may be proposed either under the estimate of a Department, under a law or a treaty, under an act or resolution of the Senate passed at the same session, or moved by a standing or select committee of this body.

Mr. COCKRELL. This amendment was recommended by a committee.

Mr. CHILTON. It has been so stated, and hence the point of order can not be sustained.

Mr. NELSON. To save time, and probably it will amount to the same thing, I will withdraw the point of order and ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. Before the vote is taken, I should like to make some inquiry in regard to the pending amendment and the one that follows it. I do not know so much about the value of the old Globe Building. The size of the lot and the frontage on the Avenue are not given. The description of it is very incomplete, and there is no statement that will enable the Senate to make a fair estimate of its value and no statement showing the necessity for it. The next amendment, which is connected with the one pending, is to me very objectionable. It proposes to purchase the Union Building:

Purchase of Union Building: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase lots B and C, 3 and 4, in square No. 454, situated on the north side of G street between Sixth and Seventh streets, in the city of Washington, D. C., and improved by a building known as the Union Building, $650,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

I know something about that building, having stabled my horses near that location while it was being constructed, and I know it is a very roughly constructed building, a cheap building, and not such a building as the Government of the United States wants for any purpose.

If we want a building, we ought to have one properly constructed, which will be suitable for the purposes designed. The building referred to is not a proper Government building by any means, and I think the price is excessive. I do not believe it could be sold in the market for $300,000, or anything like that sum.

As to the Globe Building, there is not a sufficient description given of it in the bill so as to enable us to know what is its frontage, and I am not familiar enough with it to form a correct estimate of its value. It seems to me before we buy that building we ought to have a report giving its dimensions, its height, etc., an estimate of the value of the improvements on the land, and also some statement as to the necessity for the Government owning it.

It seems to me both of these amendments ought to go out of the bill, and I shall vote against them. I am glad, however, that my friend from Minnesota has withdrawn his point of order, for that was not well taken; but as to the merits of the amendment, I am not sufficiently familiar with either one of the appropriations to vote for them.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the amendment, as I undertand it, is now before the Senate on its merits. What is the amendment? Down on the north side of Pennsylvania avenue, between here and the National Hotel, is an old, rickety building. Once on a time, before the Government itself assumed the publication of the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress, the proceedings were published there by a private company. That was when the proceedings of Congress were published in what was known as the Congressional Globe. That company occupied that building and published the proceedings of Congress as a private enterprise. Years ago Congress decided to publish its own debates in its own Printing Office, and inaugurated the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Since that time the old Globe Building has been practically vacant and abandoned, and it stands there to-day an old, dilapidated wreck of a building.

As to the piece of land there, we have many places in Washington where there are more desirable and better pieces of land for the Government to occupy, land that is more likely to rise in value, and land that occupies a far better location than that. Such being the case, what is the use, what object can there be, in buying an old, rattletrap of a building down there, for the purpose of what? Of storing certain records.

Mr. President, if we need a place to store any of the records of Congress, if we need a public storehouse, there is a straight, legitimate way of getting at it. We do not want to buy a building that is good for nothing, that is a mere wreck, that is almost tenantless, and that you could not rent to-day for the taxes—we do not want to buy such a building and load up the Government with it. That is not the way, to my mind, to run the Government business.

I therefore trust, whatever else is done, that this item in the appropriation bill will be stricken out. I am sorry that I am compelled to object to the amendment. It may seem ungracious for an ordinary, plain member like myself to object to anything proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, but, in the language of the good old Methodist hymn, I can say,

Just as I am, O Lord, I come.

I am so built that when I see anything that is not just and fair, no matter if it comes from the Angel Gabriel, I can not help it, I have got to object. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I occupied a little time this morning in looking over the sundry civil appropriation bill as it came from the Committee on Appropriations, and I confess that these two items were the ones which caused me to wonder more than all the rest of the bill as to whether or not the committee had really acted wisely.

I can not see for the life of me any more than can the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] what we want with the old Globe Building. I chance to know another party who a few months ago bargained for it, at least temporarily bargained for it, no money having been passed, but upon an examination of the building, that gentleman said to me, it was in such a dilapidated state that it was not fit for his purposes, and he did not think it was fit for any purpose. Why the Government wants to buy that old building on Pennsylvania avenue surpasses my comprehension. I trust the Senate will not agree to the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations.

I am aware of the fact that Pennsylvania avenue ought to be improved. If we would follow the example set by Napoleon, and buy the entire property from Sixth street to the Peace Monument, tear down those buildings, and erect on the ground modern buildings, there would be wisdom in it; but to purchase for the use of the Government an old building in the midst of that conglomeration of architecture, when it is about ready to tumble down, is, to my mind, a procedure that we ought not to consent to.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet, I think that the next item is equally as objectionable. I think I am correct in saying that the so-called Union Building is the building that is now occupied by the city post-office. Am I correct in that, I will ask the chairman of the committee?

Mr. ALLISON. The first two floors of that building are occupied by the city post-office, the next two floors by the Interior Department, and the next two floors by the Public Printer, and from there are distributed all the documents that Senators and Representatives send out. We are paying for this building $47,000 rent per annum.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is about what I understood the building was used for. A very considerable portion of it is used for the city post-office, but the city post-office is soon to be moved to the building which the Government has erected on Pennsylvania avenue at a very large cost; and I do not wonder when the owners of the Union Building lose as good a tenant as the United States Government for a considerable part of that building that they want to sell it to somebody.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement in respect to that?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. For the portion of the building occupied by the city post-office the Government pays $20,000 a year rent, and for the remainder of the building, occupied by other branches of the Government, there is paid $27,000 rent.

Mr. GALLINGER. So it is $47,000.

I was about to observe, further, that I notice in this bill a provision for the purchase of land for the Government Printing Office, which I think is a very judicious thing to be done—land adjacent to the present structure—something that I have always advocated, while other Senators have taken the view that we ought to purchase land in some other part of the city and erect a new Government Printing Office. If the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations to purchase that additional land for the Government Printing Office shall meet with the concurrence of Congress, then the third story of the Union Building probably will be for rent, because the Government Printing Office occupies it, and it will have additional room in the new building to be constructed and very likely will not require the third story of that building. Again, I do not wonder that the owners of that building want to sell it to somebody, and there is never so good a customer as the Government of the United States.

In addition to that, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], there is going to be a great deal of additional or waste room, as we might call it, in the new Government Post-Office building into which the Government can move some of the bureaus, for the rooms occupied by which the Government is now paying rent.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask my colleague what it is proposed to do with the present Post-Office Department building after the Department moves into the new building on Pennsylvania avenue, leaving the whole of the present Post-Office Department building subject to Government use? Will not that be the case?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should judge that that will be the case, but I have no information as to what is to be done with that building.

In reference to these two proposed amendments, however, I have only to repeat that I am clearly of the opinion that no discreet business man, acting for himself, would invest any money in the old Globe Building, so far as the building is concerned. Whether the land, situated, as it is there, in not a very desirable part of the city, is worth $4 a foot or not I am not prepared to say; but I think if the Government is going to purchase land on which to erect a building, it should not go on that part of Pennsylvania avenue for that purpose.

Regarding the building, I have expressed myself very clearly. I do not know anything about its construction. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] says it is a very cheaply constructed building, which I think is probably the fact from its appearance.

I shall vote against both these amendments, and I intended to do so when I read the bill. I hope the majority of the Senate will vote against them. If the Government is to expend money for further buildings, I trust the Government may purchase land in some desirable position of the city and erect a building, as the Government always erects buildings, of a first-class character.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber at the time when the amendment was first discussed, and I have not heard the reasons why the two pieces of property referred to should be purchased. It may be that there are some important reasons why they should come into the possession of the Government by purchase; but it seems to me that unless there is some purpose to which this property can be immediately dedicated and for which it can be used the expenditure at the present time is unnecessary.

I also think when property is to be used by the Government that property in the middle of a block should not be taken; that it should be segregated as far as possible. The buildings which the Government uses for any purpose should be on land apart from other buildings, so that they may aid in decorating, adorning, and beautifying the city.

The amount of these two appropriations is about $700,000, and I think some very strong reasons should be urged if this large outlay is to be made. The building on Pennsylvania avenue certainly is not a desirable one, and I do not see any possible use to which it can be put except the storage of documents. The sum proposed to be appropriated is a very large amount of money to pay for an old building for such a purpose. I would rather have some larger accommodations provided near the present Printing Office, or in some other suitable place, where unused public documents can be stored.

The amount of $650,000 for the purchase of the Union Building, just as the Government is about to vacate a large portion of it and carry its post-office into another part of the city, seems to me to be altogether unnecessary. I think we ought to hear more as to the necessity for the expenditure before the Senate adopts these amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, in regard to the first item here, as to the Globe Building, an amendment was offered to the bill, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, investigated by that committee, and reported favorably. When the matter came before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, we had the Acting Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Woods, whom we all know is acting as Architect, who is a man of decided ability and character, to go and examine the building and make a report to us, and also to examine the Union Building and make a report upon that. His report was that at an expenditure of anywhere from $10,000 to $15,000 the Globe Building could be made entirely safe and put in good condition for the storage of documents. The walls are good. There will need to be some additional floors, as would be needed in any building where documents are to be stored, and a new roof will also be needed.

Just in the rear of the building is an alley running north and south at a slight angle, and there is a little cross alley where there is a small piece of ground with a building on it, for which, in 1878 or 1879, we paid $100,000 for the ground, the building, printing plates, and certain bound volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. To-day the Senate is paying $1,800 for the rent of rooms for the storage of documents which are distributed through our folding room, and the House of Representatives is paying $1,800 for like rooms for the storage of documents to be distributed by members of the House. That building is convenient. It is accessible, remarkably so, having an alley on one side and an alley at the end. It has strong walls, and it can be made suitable for the storage of documents of both the Senate and the House of Representatives. It will be economy in the end to make this purchase, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Union Building is a large building, and we had it examined. It is to some extent, though not absolutely, a fireproof building; that is, it has a steel frame and is very strong. We investigated that question very thoroughly. We were told that its actual cost was the amount named in this bill. We have been paying for years $47,000 rent for that building. The city post-office occupies the lower floor and a part of the second floor, and Government employees and business occupy nearly the entire space that is left. Two floors are occupied by the Superintendent of Public Documents, where the documents which are distributed to the States, public libraries, and collegiate institutions are placed for distribution. This does not include the documents which are distributed through the Senate folding room.

A certain class of documents and a certain number of all documents go to the Superintendent of Documents, and it is through him that the general distribution to the colleges, libraries, and institutions of learning is made. Occasionally documents are distributed by him on the order of Senators, as in the case of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents. Those are placed not in the Senate and House folding rooms, but they are placed under the Superintendent of Documents, just as we heretofore placed the Census reports under the Superintendent of Documents in the Interior Department.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. How much rent does the Senator say the United States is now paying for the accommodations which they will get in these two buildings?

Mr. COCKRELL. Thirty-six hundred dollars and $47,000 would be $50,600.

Mr. HOAR. I understand for what we are now paying $50,600 a year, that we shall have to pay, if these two items are adopted, only $20,850; in other words, we make $20,000 a year by the operation.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a mistake. The entire amount proposed for the purchase of the two buildings is $695,000, and I suppose we ought to reckon it at 6 per cent. I can not borrow money for less than that.

Mr. HOAR. But the Government borrows money for less than 3 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Probably so; but I think in making such a calculation we ought not to put it at 3 per cent.

Mr. HOAR. If you put it at 6 per cent, you would save over $10,000, and at the present rate of Government bonds you would save $30,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; more than that. The Government bonds are not bringing 3 per cent.

We are paying a large sum for the rent of a great many other buildings outside of these. The Indian Office is outside of a Government building, the Geological Survey is outside, and all the outside offices will not be accommodated in the new Post-Office building. When the post-office goes into that building, and the Sixth Auditor's Office, as it was originally—now the office of the Auditor of the Post-Office Department—goes in there, and the building is occupied, there will be no space there for anything else, as everybody knows who has investigated the matter and who has heard the contention in regard to it. It is not thought that there will be rooms for the Auditor in that building.

The Auditor of the Post-Office Department has a large number of employees and requires a large space, and there are other bureaus of the Government which are going into that building. The Indian Office will not go there; the Patent Office has not room; the General Land Office has not room, and they are all occupying outside buildings. This building was erected largely, not at the instance of the Government—I do not believe any such thing as that—but at the instance of officials of the Government, for the express purpose of being leased to the Government for governmental purposes, and was built strongly for that reason, with a steel frame and strong floors, some of the upper floors being stronger than the second floor.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In what year was the building erected; can the Senator tell us?

Mr. ALLISON. It was built in 1891.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the present post-office on G street, less than a block east of the Interior Department. It is true that in that building there are not many brick partitions erected; but there is the frame. It was so left that partitions could be put up to suit the Government. Nearly all the models belonging to the Patent Office are there, and they occupy, if not all of two floors, nearly so. The Superintendent of Documents has stored there the documents I have described, which do not come to us, but which are distributed by him directly under general law to institutions of learning, to the libraries of the country, and to individuals upon our orders. He has them stored on those strong floors.

We had the Architect examine the building, and there was no indication of any sagging, no indication that the building was strained in any way. In the interest of the public, and knowing that the new Post-Office building will not accommodate all the Government offices and bureaus which are outside, we thought it would be economy to purchase the Union Building. That is the reason which governed the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from Missouri is interested more than most of the Senators in seeing that eventually we have in Washington, built modernly and one at a time, perhaps, a series of splendid public buildings, which shall be an adornment to the city and a credit to the whole country. I ask the Senator if he does not think, in view of that hope, which I know the Senator cherishes with the rest of us, that it would be wiser for us to lease buildings for a time, rather than to load ourselves with the burden of ownership of small, segregated pieces of property, which would be of no value eventually if these larger buildings are constructed, and the ownership of which might stand in the way of the erection of large and new and independent buildings, such as ought some day to adorn the city of Washington?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Government will never erect a costly ornamental building simply for the purpose of storing documents until such time as they can be distributed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, no; I do not mean for temporary storage.

Mr. COCKRELL. We had an instance of that in the erection of the building for a folding room. The bureaus that will go into this building can be accommodated.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let me ask the Senator if his own colleague did not have a bill pending here for years for the erection of a hall of records which would be for that very purpose?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not for the storage of documents. That was to provide a place for the storage of the paper records of the different Departments, so as to take them out of the Department buildings, but it was not for the storage of documents, as I understood it.

Mr. PASCO. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not think the two objects could properly be combined in one large, handsome, and magnificent building for the storage of records and documents? One large building erected for those two important purposes would justify the expenditure of a large amount of money.

Mr. STEWART. A thoroughly fireproof building.

Mr. COCKRELL. So far as being fireproof is concerned, either one of these buildings is practically fireproof. There is no danger about that. We may theorize about what may be done and what can be done, but we shall never get a building of that kind. The jurisdiction over such buildings is always in contest. We have had a sad experience in regard to the Post-Office building, a wrangle and contention as to who shall have jurisdiction over it and who shall control it, and that will exist all the time. You will never see, in my judgment, a time when some of the branches of the Government will not be occupying buildings outside of the Department buildings proper.

For the Senate and House officers we need a building where documents can be stored, which will be convenient to the Printing Office, so as to store them until Senators wish to distribute them. That was the idea in proposing to purchase this building. If we undertake to erect a public building here, by the time we get it finished the increase of the Government employees will be such that there will be as many left outside as there were at the time it was begun; and that is now the case with the new Post-Office building on Pennsylvania avenue. We have been at work on that building for years, and yet we are not in occupancy of it, and by the time we get another building there will be a further increase in the number of employees.

These are the views of the committee. The committee simply thought it would be economy in the end to purchase these two buildings.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, knowing well the many difficulties the Committee on Appropriations contend with from day to day, and fully appreciating their commendable desire to reduce expenditures for rent in this District, I nevertheless feel that a public policy is involved in this question that should be pretty thoroughly understood before proceeding upon the lines indicated by these two amendments.

In the first place, it is proposed in a clause of the bill to enlarge the Government holdings of ground adjacent to the Government Printing Office. That extension should go far enough to accommodate the document rooms intended to be supplied in the Globe Building. Why transport public documents from the Government Printing Office ten or twelve blocks to a point on Pennsylvania avenue, instead of sending them from the printing room to an adjacent room for distribution? So the Globe Building proposition could be more advantageously taken care of contiguous to the Government Printing Office itself, and thus avoid an external expense of cartage or drayage charges between the place where the document is produced and the place where it is intended to be distributed.

But beyond that, Mr. President, the very apt suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] is to be considered. The building of an appropriate fireproof hall of records within the limits of this District has been a necessity for many years recognized by those familiar with the facts. If we begin now to purchase in piecemeal shanties and buildings here and there throughout the District for the purpose of storing documents and transacting the Government business in various parts of the city, rather than in concentrated points or places, we initiate a policy which will defer indefinitely and perchance ultimately defeat the commendable purpose of building a substantial, central, fireproof hall of records, accessible equally to all the Departments and to the Capitol Building as well.

I had some years ago occasion to visit the Union Building. It was proposed to move the General Land Office into that building. The Architect of the Capitol was called upon at that time to look the building over, and as the result of examinations by committees appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, the committee appointed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and personal examinations by both officers it was determined that the building was so constructed that the waste room within it would forbid the attempt to use it as any part or portion of a public office connected with the Land Office.

The building is constructed upon what is known as the slow-burning process. Anyone familiar with construction will pronounce it a cheap building. It is not a fireproof building. It is not a building fit for office purposes. It is not a suitable building for storage purposes. It is a building, in my humble judgment, put up in the cheapest possible manner, to be temporarily rented to the United States at a high rent and ultimately dumped upon the Government at a high figure.

The old Globe Building I only know as a passer-by on Pennsylvania avenue. It may be for sale at a very low figure compared with the rental we pay. My observation is that the Government, for the same accommodations, pays greater rent in the District than can be obtained from any individual, company, or corporation in the District; that, as a rule, the Government rents buildings that can not be rented to individuals. It was the case with the Census Office. It is the case with most of the buildings rented from time to time.

Now it is suggested that because, forsooth, we can save $30,000 a year for the next few years in rent or interest, if you please, it behooves us to load upon the Government a pile of property at an exorbitant price, for which the Government, when the hall of records shall have been constructed, will have no use whatever. Will Senators reflect upon the probable price we could get for the Union Building when the Government ceased to find it available for Government purposes and offered it at public auction? The part of the city in which it is located is not desirable for Government offices. It is a livery-stable community. It has livery stables either upon both sides of it or one, and I believe upon the opposite side, above and below. The street is narrow. There is no vacant space on either side of the building such as is contemplated usually for a Government building, to guard it against fire from external cause or contact with other buildings.

If we are in need of a hall of records, and I believe we are, let the $700,000 that is to be invested in these two old buildings be doubled and let us start at once upon the work of construction. The Government to-day has a part or portion of the Judiciary Square in which a hall of records may be constructed, and we could connect that central building with the various Departments by a pneumatic-tube system or otherwise, so that documents may not only be preserved from fire, but may be rapidly distributed and at slight cost.

I doubt not that the prices named for these buildings are the best that can be obtained, but the plan or theory upon which we thus drift in the purchase is a pernicious one and will tend to prevent the accomplishment of the ultimate end in view, to wit, the concentration of the Government buildings rather than scattering them all over the District.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I quite agree with everything the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has said. I look upon this purchase as if I were going to purchase it myself. I do not think I would buy for myself any land on Pennsylvania avenue, especially an old building hardly suited to any purpose requiring modern conveniences. I think the Government has too much land on Pennsylvania avenue already. It is known that whenever there is high water in the Potomac the cellars are flooded, and I do not see what the Government wants with property of that kind.

The Senator from Montana is right when he says, if we need buildings for public service, let us build them in good places and on good sites, and construct modern buildings—for the best kind is none too good for the Government—with all the fittings, conveniences, and improvements that belong to a modern building, steam heat, electricity, etc.

This is an old building. It could hardly be used for anything else than what is proposed here, and it will not properly serve the purpose for which it is to be bought. I think that in the future, in making purchases for the Government, we ought to make them upon the theory that the Government is going to last a long time, that the buildings shall be useful, and that we should construct the best possible buildings, according to some approved plan or system, and let the buildings be befitting in their architecture.

I agree with the Senator that perhaps on Capitol Hill, connected with some other public building, would be a suitable place. This seems a high price to me. I do not know any individual who would give so much money for this property. That we already have land there is no argument to me to agree to this amendment. We ought not to increase our bad investments. We ought not to buy any bad land. My judgment would be to sell the land badly located and buy good land elsewhere and erect a modern building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEWART. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator who has the bill in charge whether he knows what the actual assessed value of the property is?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not. I will state that this amendment was sent to us by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which the Senator's colleague is chairman, and of course that committee is more familiar with the details than I can be. The general information before the committee was that the building cost about $650,000 to construct, in addition to the land.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator refers to the Union Building?

Mr. ALLISON. The Union Building. Personally, I do not know what its value is.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the Senator know at what the property is assessed?

Mr. ALLISON. I have just answered that I do not know. The matter was sent to us from another committee—the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely wish to state that if this matter was considered in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, it was at some time when I was not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. As he has not voted, I will withhold my vote. I should vote "nay," if he were present.

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when the name of Mr. PERKINS was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CAFFERY. I am paired generally with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I am not advised how he would stand on this question, and I will therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who seems to be absent. I suggest to the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] that we transfer our pairs. I have voted, and that will enable my vote to stand and the Senator from Florida to vote.

Mr. PASCO. Very well. I vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that he transfer his pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], so that he and I may vote.

Mr. MARTIN. Very well.

Mr. NELSON. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 38; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 5, after line 8, to insert:

Purchase of Union Building: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase lots B and C, 3 and 4, in square No. 454, situated on the north side of G street between Sixth and Seventh streets, in the city of Washington, D. C., and improved by a building known as the Union Building, $650,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this is a very large sum of money, and I think it fair to the Senate that the committee should give us more information than I certainly at present have on this subject. I should like to be informed how the amount which has been fixed here, $650,000, has been arrived at, and also to reiterate the request that was made as to the last item in the bill, for information as to the assessed value of the property for taxation. I know that is not an infallible guide, but it is of some value in considering a question of this kind. I am led to believe myself from mere observation of this building that the sum fixed is an exorbitant one. I wish to know how it was reached, and what is the assessed value of this building for taxation.

Mr. QUAY. I am not able to inform the Senator from New Hampshire what is the assessed value of the building. The amount stated in the bill represents its actual cost. It is the building now occupied by the city post-office, which we all know is shortly to be removed to the public building now in process of erection. It was built at the suggestion of the Government in 1890. The character of the building will appear from papers in the possession, I believe, of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, which I trust he will place before the Senate, if he has them here. It is a building which was built especially, as I have stated, for public uses. It is occupied entirely by the Government. The Government to-day pays a rent of $47,000 for it, which is much more than a fair percentage upon the amount fixed in the bill as a proper indemnification for the owners of the property.

The Census Office are now, I believe, anxious to occupy the space which is shortly to be vacated by the post-office, and it appeared to the Committee on Appropriations that it was wise economy on the part of the Government to take possession of the building now. That is about all I have to say upon the subject, I believe. The Senator from Iowa in charge of the bill has in his possession a letter from the corporation addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the House which will explain everything that is necessary for the enlightenment of the Senate upon the subject. If the Senator from Iowa will send me the letter, I will ask to have it read. I ask the Secretary to read the paper I send to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 11, 1897.

DEAR SIR: Complying with your request, I send you herewith drawings showing the basement and first and second floors of the Union Building, situate on G street, between Sixth and Seventh streets NW. The five remaining floors are identical with the second-floor plan. I also inclose a statement showing the floor of each floor. You will observe the total floor space in the building is 138,297 square feet, a fraction over 3 acres. This statement will also show the occupancy of each floor, date of occupancy, and amount of rent paid per annum. In addition to this, you will find a statement showing the superficial carrying capacity of each floor and the thickness of the walls of the building. The average carrying capacity is a fraction over 90 pounds per square foot, evenly distributed. The usual superficial carrying capacity of the average office building is 20 pounds per square foot.

The building has a frontage of 106 feet 6 inches by a depth of 212 feet 6 inches, and is fireproof. There is a 15-foot alley on the west side opening on G street, 30 foot alley in the rear, and a 30-foot alley on the east side running back 112 feet 6 inches to a 15 foot alley opening on Sixth street, giving two outlets and offering the best possible facilities for loading and unloading United States mail or freight of every description.

The Union Building was built in 1801 and 1802 at the suggestion of the Government, which at that time was greatly in need of quarters for the city post-office. It is centrally located, was built in the belief and on a style that would commend and insure its entire occupancy by the Government, and cost $650,000.

Very truly, yours, MYRON M. PARKER,
President Union Building Company.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Chairman of Appropriations Committee,
House of Representatives, City.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not gather from the reading whether the building is fireproof.

Mr. QUAY. It is fireproof.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not gather whether it is built of iron and brick.

Mr. QUAY. It is entirely fireproof.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, would tell us, if he knows, what Department is to be the future occupant of the present post-office building after the Post-Office Department has been moved into the new building upon Pennsylvania avenue?

Mr. QUAY. I mentioned in my remarks before that the Census Bureau or some of the officers have been consulting with the proprietors of this building in relation to the occupancy of the space to be vacated. Of course it will be occupied for any purpose for which the Government may lease it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I mean the present Post-Office Department building, which is to be vacated—the general Post-Office Department, where the Postmaster-General is. What is to become of that building when it is vacated if we are to buy all the present buildings in the city that are now occupied by Government offices?

Mr. QUAY. My understanding is, although I have it not officially, from the Secretary of the Interior that the office will be taken possession of by that Department. I do not know that there is any special arrangement to that effect.

Mr. CHANDLER. By the overflow from the Interior Department?

Mr. QUAY. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am opposed to paying so large a sum as this for that building at the present time. I do not see now any valuation of it. I am not told how much it is valued at for purposes of taxation. My belief is that it is not valued for purposes of taxation at over $150,000.

Mr. QUAY. I do not know.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think we are entitled to more information before the Senate is asked to take so large an appropriation upon itself as an amendment to a House bill, when the House of Representatives does not appear to have been convinced from the letter, which has been read, to the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, that this purchase ought to be made. I do not think the Senate ought to put this large amount upon the bill with its present information, or rather lack of information, as to its real value and as to the necessity of further using it for the purposes of the Government.

The statement that the building was built at the suggestion of the Government is very indefinite. Who is the Government? If there had been any formal or official request for the construction of this building, it would have been here. Who is authorized to suggest the construction of a $600,000 building for the Government? Did the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations make the suggestion? I can think of no person connected with the legislative branch of the Government who would be any more entitled to make the suggestion or any more likely to carry out any intimation that at the proper time the building would be purchased by the Government than the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CANNON. May I interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The Senator appears desirous of learning the assessed valuation of this building and the ground upon which it stands. I am advised by the proper official of the District that the assessed valuation of the ground and building is $173,912.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not think it was over $200,000. I guessed that it would be $150,000. If the assessed value had been $200,000, then we should have been obliged to assume that property in this District is assessed for only about one-third of its real value. I suppose over the country a fair rate of valuation for purposes of taxation is about two-thirds of the value of property. Suppose the assessment were $200,000 and it was two-thirds of the value, then the property would be worth $300,000.

I repeat, Mr. President, that is an enormous overvaluation of this piece of property, even if the Government ought to purchase it.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I know nothing about the valuation of the property except from what was stated by those who seem to understand the proper value of property in this city. I am told that the building and site could not be replaced for the amount of money here appropriated. As the Senator from New Hampshire, as usual, seeks to have all the information possible upon this subject, I suggest to the chairman of the committee that the item go over and by to-morrow I shall be able to give him the information of which he is in search.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment of the committee will go over for the present.

Mr. STEWART. We had better have it disposed of now, I think.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from New Hampshire desires some information which the Senator from Pennsylvania thinks he can furnish.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to have the amendment go over until to-morrow, when I can furnish the information of which the Senator from New Hampshire is in search.

Mr. ALLISON. I will allow it to be passed over.

Mr. STEWART. For what purpose?

Mr. ALLISON. For the information which the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to furnish to the Senator from New Hampshire and other Senators.

Mr. QUAY. As to the valuation of the property under the officers of the Government at whose suggestion the house was built.

Mr. STEWART. I think if Senators will look at the building and inform themselves a little concerning it between now and the time the vote is taken there will be no danger of the amendment being agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be passed over for the present.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, after line 18, to insert:
